Sheridan, Richard Brinsley Butler. Born at Dublin, Sept. 30, 1751; died at London, July 7, 1816. A noted British dramatist, orator, and politician; son of Thomas Sheridan (1721-1788). He was educated at Harrow; settled in London in 1773; and married Miss Linley, a singer ("The Maid of Bath"), and daughter of the composer. He bought Garrick's share of Drury Lane Theatre in 1779; and in 1778, with his associates, bought the remaining half. He entered Parliament in 1780 as Whig member for Stafford; and was under-secretary for foreign affairs in 1782, and secretary of the treasury in 1783. He was one of the Whig leaders; was distinguished by his speeches (1787-94) on the impeachment of Warren Hastings; was treasurer of the navy in 1806; and left Parliament in 1812. He was in favor of the French Revolution, and denounced Napoleon. He was a favorite companion of the prince regent (George IV) and the wits of the time, but his last years were obscured by debt and disappointment. His dramatic works are "The Rivals" (1775), "St. Patrick's Day" (1776), "The Duenna" (1775), "A Trip to Scarborough" (1777; altered from Vanbrugh's "Relapse"), "The School for Scandal" (1777), "The Critic" (1779), and "Pizarro" (1799; a translation from Kotzebue).

He was manager of a Dublin theater for 10 years, and of Drury Lane after his son Richard Brinsley Sheridan bought out Garrick there. He wrote "Dictionary of the English Language," "Life of Swift" (1784; whose works he edited in 17 volumes), and works on education.

Sheridan's Ride. A famous incident of the battle of Cedar Creek, Virginia, Oct. 19, 1864. Sheridan's army, which was encamped on Cedar Creek in the Shenandoah Valley, was surprised before daybreak and defeated by the Confederates under General Early. Sheridan, who was at Winchester, twenty miles from the field, on his return from a visit to Washington, heard the sound of battle and rode rapidly to the scene of action. As he galloped past the retreating soldiers, he shouted, "Face the other way, boys! We are going back!" He reformed his corps, and before the close of the day had gained a decisive victory. This incident has been made the subject of a poem by T. E. Read, entitled "Sheridan's Ride" (1865).

Sheriffmuir (sher-if-mür'). A plateau in Perthshire, Scotland, situated near Dunblane 5 miles north of Stirling. Here, Nov. 13, 1715, an indecisive battle was fought between the Royalists (3,000-4,000), under the Duke of Argyll, and the Jacobite Highlanders (9,000-12,000), under the Earl of Mar.

Sheshonk, or Sheshenk. See Shishak.

She Stoops to Conquer, or the Mistakes of a Night. A comedy by Oliver Goldsmith, first played March 15, 1773, printed 1774.

At the present day it is probably the best known of the author's works, and, outside Shakespeare and Sheridan, the English play with which the greatest number of persons are familiar. Of post-Elizabethan comedies which preceded it in this country, those of Congreve alone can be named by its side; and, if it is less artistically constructed, somewhat less carefully written, and much less witty, its moral purity and wholesomeness, its fund of good spirits, and its wonderful flow of natural dialogue, are qualities that raise it almost to a level with "Love for Love" or "The Way of the World." Of succeeding comedies, but one has approached it in lasting popularity—the "School for Scandal," produced four years later, by Sheridan. Gosse, Hist. Eng. Lit., p. 319.

Shirley, James. Born at London, Sept. 18, 1596; died at London, Oct. 29, 1666. An English dramatist. He was educated at Merchant Taylors' School, London, and at both Oxford and Cambridge. Owing to scruples of conscience he gave up a living to which he had been presented after ordination, taught school for a time, and from about 1625 wrote from thirty to forty plays. Among them are "Love Tricks" (published in 1631), "The Maid's Revenge" (1633), "The Brothers" (1632), "The Witty Fair One" (1633), "The Grateful Servant" (licensed in 1629, under the title of "The Faithful Servant," and printed in 1630), "The Traitor" (1635: the most powerful and pathetic of Shirley's tragedies), "Love's Cruelty" (1640), "The Change" (1632), "Bird in a Cage" (1633), "Hyde Park" (1637), "The Ball" (licensed Nov. 16, 1632, and printed 1639 as the joint work of Chapman and Shirley), "The Gamester" (1637), "The Contention of Honour and Riches" (published in 1633, and evidently not intended for representation), "The Coronation" (licensed Feb. 6, 1634-35, as "a play by Shirley," but the title-page of the first edition in 1640 gives it to Fletcher, who had died ten years before: Shirley claimed it as his, but it has continued to appear in all collections of Beaumont and Fletcher's works), "Habet, Admiral of France" (the joint performance of Chapman and Shirley, licensed April 29, 1635, and printed 1639: Shirley had little to do with this), "The Lady of Pleasure" (1637: generally considered his best play), "St. Patrick for Ireland" (1640), "The Humorous Courtier" (1640), "The Arcadia" (1640), "The Imposture" (1652), "The Cardinal" (1652), and "The Sisters" (1652). In 1659 Shirley published, together, "Honoria and Mammon" and "The Contentions of Ajax and Ulysses for the Armour of Achilles." The first piece was a revision of his own interlude called "The Contention of Honour and Riches." He also wrote "Manducio, or a Leading of Children by the Hand through the Principles of Grammar" (1660). He also finished and fitted for the stage a number of Fletcher's plays. Henry Shirley, a contemporary of James Shirley, wrote a play called "The Martyred Soldier," which was acted and printed in 1638.

Shirley, John. Born about 1368; died at London, Oct. 21, 1456. An English traveler and collector of manuscripts, especially those of Chaucer and Lydgate. He copied them himself "in sundry volumes to remain for posterity." Some of them are preserved in the British Museum; one at Trinity College, Cambridge; and one at Sion College.

Shirley, Lawrence, fourth Earl Ferrers. Born in Aug., 1720; died May 5, 1760. An English nobleman, notable as the last nobleman who died a felon's death in England. He murdered his land-steward, Johnson, in a fit of ungovernable passion (to which he was subject), in Jan., 1760, and was hanged at Tyburn.

Shirley, Selina, Countess of Huntingdon. Born near Ashby-de-la-Zouch, Aug. 24, 1707; died at London, June 17, 1791. An English religious leader, daughter of the second Earl Ferrers. She was noted as the founder of chapels and as the leader of the sect of the "Countess of Huntingdon's Connexion."

Shirley, William. Born at Preston, Sussex, England, 1693; died at Roxbury, Mass., March 24, 1771. A colonial governor of Massachusetts 1741-45. He planned the expedition against Louisbourg in 1745; became governor of Massachusetts in 1753; was commander of the British forces in America at the beginning of the Old French and Indian war in 1755; planned the expedition against Niagara in 1755; was made lieutenant-general in 1759; and afterward was governor of one of the Bahama Islands. He published "Letter to the Duke of Newcastle" (1745), "Conduct of General William Shirley" (1758), etc.

Shishak (shī'shak) I., or Sheshonk (shē'shonk), or Shashanq. Lived in the 10th century B. C. A king of Egypt, of the 22d dynasty. He plundered Jerusalem in the reign of Rehoboam.

Shiva (shī'va). The third god of the Hindu triad, in the later mythology regarded as the destroyer, while Brahma is the creator and Vishnu the preserver. The Shivas, or Shiva-worshippers, assign to him the first place in the triad, identifying him with creation and reproduction as well as destruction, and so constituting him the Supreme Being. This character in present Hinduism is supposed to be a development of that of the Vedic Rudra (which see) by the addition of many characteristics drawn from the popular as distinguished from the priestly religion, and taken especially from the religion of the aborigines, whose chief god some suppose Shiva to have been. The name Shiva, the propitious, seems to have been at first only a euhemistic epithet used to propitiate Rudra, the god of storms, and then to have supplanted the name Rudra itself. According to the Vishnu-purana there are 8 principal manifestations of Shiva, viz.: Rudra, Bhava, Sharva, Ishana, Pashupati, Bhima, Ugra, and Mahadeva, which are visibly represented under 8 tantras, or material forms, viz.: the Sun, Water, Earth, Air, Fire, Ether, the officiating Brahman, and the Moon, Shiva upholding the universe by means of these forms. As presiding over reproduction which follows destruction, he is generally worshipped under phallic symbols. As sharing with Yama and Varuna the attributes of justice and punishment, he rides on a white bull, Dharmata having taken this form to become Shiva's vehicle; as Kala, or destroying 'time,' he is black; as Ardhanari, 'half-female,' he symbolizes the unity of the generative principle; as Panchanama he has 5 faces; he has 3 eyes, one in his forehead, which are held to denote his view of present, past, and future; while a crescent about the central eye marks the measure of time by months a serpent around his neck that by years, and a necklace of skulls and serpents about his person the revolution of ages. His hair is thickly matted, and projects like a horn from his forehead. On his head he bears the Ganges. His throat is dark-blue from the poison which would have destroyed the world had he not swallowed it at the churning of the ocean. He wears sometimes a deerskin, sometimes a tigerskin, sometimes an elephant's skin, and at times sits on a tiger-skin or holds a deer in one of his hands. His weapons are a trident (now held to symbolize him as Creator, Destroyer, and Regenerator), a bow, a thunderbolt, an ax, a skull-surmounted staff, and a nondescript weapon, the khinkira. He carries a drum shaped like an hour-glass, and a noose. His servants are the demons called Pramathas, his chief wife Durga with her various names, and his sons Ganesha and Kartikeya. His residence is Kailasa, one of the loftiest peaks of the Himalaya. He is especially worshipped at Benares. He has even more names than Vishnu, 1,008 being specified in the Shiva Purana and the Mahabharata. See Earth's "Religions of India," 159 ff.; Williams's "Brahmanism and Hinduism," III. IV.; and Muir's "Original Sanskrit Texts," Vol. IV.

Shore (shōr), Jane. Born at London; died in 1527. The mistress of King Edward IV. While still a girl she married William Shore, a citizen of London. After her intrigue with the king began she lived in the greatest luxury, and after his death she became the mistress of Lord Hastings who was beheaded by Richard III, June 13, 1483. Richard imprisoned Jane Shore out of malice and pretended virtue, robbed her house, accused her of witchcraft and obliged her to do penance for unchastity at Paul's Cross. She afterward became the mistress of the Marquis of Dorset. The agonizing details of her death in a ditch from starvation are without authority, though the old ballad gives them with great precision. See Jane Shore.

Shoreditch (shōr'dich). A borough (municipal) of London, situated north of the Thames.

Shoreham (shōr'am), or New Shoreham. A seaport in Sussex, England, situated on the English Channel 6 miles west of Brighton. Population (1891), 3,393.

Shoshoko (shō-shō'kō). [Pl., also Shoshokos.] A name meaning 'walker,' applied collectively to the poorer bands and individuals of Shoshonean tribes of North American Indians who do not own horses, and are therefore "walkers." The name Digger (which see) has been applied more generally to this class than to any other.

Shoshonean (shō-shō'nē-an). An important linguistic stock of North American Indians. Their early habitat included southwestern Montana; all of Idaho south of lat. 45° 30'; southeastern Oregon south of the Blue Mountains; western and central Colorado; a strip in northern New Mexico; eastern New Mexico; all of northwestern Texas; the entire territory of Utah; a section in northern Arizona; all of Nevada; and a small strip in the northeastern part of California, east of the Sierras, and a wide section along the eastern border south of lat. 38°, extending also across the mountains to the sources of the San Joaquin and Kings rivers, as well as in a wide band over the southern portion of the State, reaching northward to Tulare Lake. Along the Pacific the tribes of this stock forced their way between the Chumashan and Yuman stocks, and occupied the coast between lats. 33° and 34° N. The principal Shoshonean tribes are the Bannock, Chemehuevi, Comanche, Gosuete, Paiute, Paviotso, Saidynka, Shoshoni, Tobikhar, Tukuarika, Tusayan, and Uta. Estimated number, 16,460. The name of the stock is adopted from that of the Shoshoni tribe.

Shoshone Falls (shō-shō'nē fälz). A cataract in the Snake River, in Idaho, about lat. 42° 35' N., long. 114° 20' W. It is one of the grandest falls in the United States. Height, 210 feet. Width, about 900 feet.

Shoshone River. See Snake River.

Shoshoni (shō-shō'ni). [Origin of name uncertain.] The most northerly division of the Shoshonean stock of North American Indians. It comprises a number of tribes which formerly occupied western Wyoming, part of central and southern Idaho, a small area in eastern Oregon, western and central Nevada, and a small strip of Utah west of Great Salt Lake. The Snake River region of Idaho was their chief seat. In 1803 they were on the head waters of the Missouri in western Montana, but they had earlier ranged farther east on the plains, whence they had been driven into the Rocky Mountains by the Atsina and Blackfeet. The most important of the twenty known tribes comprising the Shoshoni division are the Panamint, Tukuarika or sheep-eaters, and Washaki. They number about 5,000. Of these about 1,000 are under Fort Hall agency and 300 under Lemhi agency, Idaho. Also called Snakes. See Shoshonean.

Shuzub (shō'zōb). A name of two Babylonian kings. (a) The first was of Babylonian origin. On his accession to the Babylonian throne, he assumed the name of Nergal-Ushēzib ('Nergal delivered'). After reigning a year and six months, he was taken captive by Sennacherib in the battle of Nippur (Nifer), 694 B. C. (b) The second was a Chaldean, successor of the preceding under the name of Mushezib-Marduk. He bought with the treasures of the temple of Marduk (Merodach) the help of the Elamite king Ummā-menann, but both were routed by Sennacherib in the battle of Halule, 691 B. C. When in 680 (or 689) Sennacherib invaded and destroyed Babylon, Shuzub sought refuge with his former ally Ummā-menann, but was delivered by him into the hands of the Assyrians.

Shyenne. See Cheyenne.

Shylock (shī'lok). A Jew, one of the principal characters in Shakespeare's "Merchant of Venice." He lends Bassanio 3,000 ducats on condition that if they are not repaid at the promised time he shall be allowed to cut a pound of flesh from the body of Antonio, Bassanio's friend and surety. He claims the forfeiture, but is defeated by Portia, who, in a celebrated speech, reminds him that he loses his life if he sheds one drop of Christian blood or takes more or less than his lawful pound of flesh. Down to the time of Macklin the part was played by the low comedian, and was grotesque to buffoonery. He transformed it from "the grimaces of low comedy to the solemn sweep of tragedy," and made Shylock a revengeful, inexorable money-maker. Edmund Keau, in 1814, played the part as that of "a Jew more sinned against than sinning. . . . From that hour a reaction in favor of Shylock set in, until now it is generally agreed that up to a certain point he was the victim of a downright quibble, and that even on the third point, that of conspiracy, his conviction was perhaps of doubtful propriety" (Furness).

Sia (sē'ā). A tribe of North American Indians inhabiting a pueblo of the same name on the Rio Jemez, a western affluent of the Rio Grande, in New Mexico. In 1582 Sia was said to be the largest of five villages forming a province called Punames. The present pueblo dates from about 1692, when the village formerly occupied was abandoned. The tribe, which was once comparatively populous, now numbers but 106. The decrease is attributed largely to infectious disease and to the killing of persons accused of witchcraft. Also Choa, Chia, Cia, Cilla, Silla, Tsea, Tsia, Tzia, Zia. See Keresau.

Sialkot, or Sealkote (sē-āl-kōt'). 1. A district in Amritsar division, Punjab, British India, intersected by lat. 32° 20' N., long. 74° 30' E. Area, 1,991 square miles. Population (1891), 1,119,847.—2. The capital of the district of Sialkot, situated about lat. 32° 30' N., long. 74° 35' E. Population (1891), 55,087.

Siam (si-gm' or sē-ām'). A kingdom in the peninsula of Indo-China, in southeastern Asia. Capital, Bangkok. It is bounded by Burma on the west, the vague Shan states on the north, the French dependencies Tongking, Anam (the river Mekong being the recognized boundary), and Cambodia on the east, and the Gulf of Siam on the south. In addition Siam has a considerable part of the Malay Peninsula. The principal river is the Menam. The chief product is rice. The government is vested in the king and a council of ministers. The prevailing religion is Buddhism. The capital, Ayuthia, was founded about 1350. In the 16th century the country was enlarged, and trade commenced with Europe. Ayuthia was sacked by the Burmese in 1767, and the capital transferred to Bangkok 1782. Western civilization has been partially introduced in recent years. French advances and claims along the eastern frontier led in 1893 to serious complications, nearly involving England. The French in July entered the Menam River and blockaded Bangkok; and in Oct. Siam ceded to France about 100,000 square miles east of the river Mekong. Area, about 200,000 square miles. Population, about 5,000,000.

Siam, Gulf of. An arm of the Pacific Ocean, partly inclosed by the Malay Peninsula on the west, Siam on the north, and Cambodia and Cochin-China on the northeast. Length, about 470 miles.

Siamese Twins (si-a-mēs' or -mēs' twinz). The. Born in Siam, April 15, 1811; died in North Carolina, Jan. 17, 1874. Eng and Chang, twins born of a Chinese father and a Siamese mother. They were joined to one another by a short tubular cartilaginous band, through which their livers and hepatic vessels communicated, and in the center of which was their common umbilicus. They were brought to America for exhibition in 1828, and after making a competency in various countries settled in North Carolina. They married sisters in 1842. In 1869 they again exhibited themselves in Europe. The one survived the other two hours and a half.

He was the first professor of medicine in the University of Edinburgh, the first president of the College of Physicians, and geographer royal. In 1710 he published "A History of Fife and Fifeshire," followed by similar works of local interest.

Siberia (sī-bē'ri-ä). [Russ. Sibir, F. Sibérie, G. Sibirien.] A vast region in northern and central Asia, which forms part of the Russian empire. Chief towns, Tomsk and Irkutsk. It is bounded by the Arctic Ocean on the north, Bering Strait on the northeast, the Pacific and its arms on the east, the Chinese empire and Russian Central Asia on the south, and Russia on the west. It comprises officially West Siberia (including the governments of Tobolsk and Tomsk), Irkutsk (with the governments of Irkutsk, Yeniseisk, and Yakutsk), and the Amur Region (Amur, Transbaikalia, the Maritime Province) and the island of Saghalin. The surface is largely a low-lying plain in the north; in the interior and the south it is a plateau traversed by chains of mountains, including the Altai, Sayan, Baikal, Yablonoi, Stanovoi, etc. The principal rivers are the Obi (with the Irtysh), Yenisei (with the Angara), Lena, and Amur. The largest lake is Baikal. The leading occupation is agriculture. Siberia contains considerable mineral wealth, including gold, platinum, silver, iron, lead, etc. Government is administered by governors-general and governors. The inhabitants are largely Russians; there are also Buriats, Kirghiz, Tanguzes, Yakuts, Kalmucks, Ostiaks, Samoyeds, Kamchadales, etc., besides many thousands of exiles from European Russia. The Russian conquest commenced in the 16th century, in the reign of Ivan the Terrible, and advanced to Lake Baikal, the Amur, and the Pacific in the 17th century. Saghalin was formally acquired in 1875. Area, 4,833,496 square miles. Pop. (1897), 5,727,000.

Siberian Railway. A railway under construction by the Russian government, to traverse Siberia from west to east. Ground was broken in 1891, and the work will be completed about 1904. The line is to run from Cheliabinsk, via Omsk and Irkutsk, to Vladivostok on the Pacific — over 4,000 miles.

Sibley (sib'li), Henry Hastings. Born at Detroit, Mich., Feb. 20, 1811; died at St. Paul, Minn., Feb. 18, 1891. An American pioneer, politician, and general. He was a delegate to Congress from Wisconsin Territory in 1849, and from Minnesota Territory 1849-53; and was elected first governor of Minnesota as a Democrat in 1858. He organized a force for the protection of the frontier settlements against the Sioux in 1862, when he received a commission as brigadier-general. He put down the Sioux outbreak of that year.

Sibley, Henry Hopkins. Born at Natchitoches, La., May 25, 1816; died at Fredericksburg, Va., Aug. 23, 1886. An American general. He served in the Mexican war; entered the Confederate service at the outbreak of the Civil War in 1861; and commanded in New Mexico in 1862. He entered the Egyptian service in 1869, with the rank of brigadier-general, returning to the United States five years later.

Sibley, Hiram. Born at North Adams, Mass., Feb. 6, 1807; died at Rochester, N. Y., July 12, 1888. An American financier. He was one of the organizers and the first president in 1861 of the telegraph line across the continent to California (afterward transferred to the Western Union). During his presidency the Western Union expended $3,000,000 on a line to Europe via Bering Strait, which was abandoned on the completion of the Atlantic cable. He gave $100,000 for the establishment of the Sibley College of Mechanical Engineering and the Mechanic Arts, connected with Cornell University.

Sibley, John Langdon. Born at Union, Maine, Dec. 29, 1804; died at Cambridge, Mass., Dec. 9, 1885. An American librarian. He was assistant librarian of Harvard College 1841-55, and librarian 1856-77. He was editor for many years of the annual, triennial, and quinquennial catalogues of Harvard; and wrote "Biographical Sketches of the Graduates of Harvard University" (3 vols. 1873-85).

Sibola. See Cibola and Zuñi.

Sibthorp (sib'thōrp), John. Born at Oxford, England, Oct. 28, 1758; died at Bath, Feb. 8, 1796. An English botanist, son of Dr. Humphrey Sibthorp, professor of botany at Oxford. He graduated at Oxford in 1778; studied medicine; became professor of botany at the College of Physicians in 1781; and succeeded his father at Oxford. He wrote "Flora Oxoniensis" (1794) and "Flora Græca" (edited by J. E. Smith and John Lindley, 1807 et seq.).

Sibylline Books, Sibylline Oracles. See Sibyls.

Sibyls (sib'ilz). In ancient mythology, certain women reputed to possess special powers of prophecy or divination and intercession with the gods in behalf of those who resorted to them. Different writers mention from one to twelve sibyls, but the number commonly reckoned is ten, enumerated as the Persian or Babylonian, Libyan, Delphian, Cimmerian, Erythrean, Samian, Cumæan, Hellespontine or Trojan, Phrygian, and Tiburtine. Of these the most celebrated was the Cumæan sibyl (of Cumæ in Italy), who, according to the story, appeared before Tarquin the Proud and offered him nine books for sale. He refused to buy them, whereupon she burned three, and offered the remaining six at the original price. On being again refused, she destroyed three more, and offered the remaining three at the price she had asked for the nine. Tarquin, astonished at this conduct, bought the books, which were found to contain directions as to the worship of the gods and the policy of the Romans. These Sibylline Books, or books professing to have this origin, written in Greek hexameters, were kept with great care at Rome, and consulted from time to time by oracles kepters under the direction of the senate. They were destroyed at the burning of the temple of Jupiter in 83 B. C. Fresh collections were made, which were finally destroyed soon after A. D. 400. The Sibylline Oracles referred to by the Christian fathers belong to early ecclesiastical literature, and are a curious mixture of Jewish and Christian material, with probably here and there a snatch from the older pagan source. In composition they seem to be of various dates, from the 2d century before to the 3d century after Christ.

But the Sibylline verses, which clearly belong to this period (of Antoninus), express, in the most remarkable manner, this spirit of exulting menace at the expected simultaneous fall of Roman idolatry and of Roman empire. The origin of the whole of the Sibylline oracles now extant is not distinctly apparent, either from the style, the manner of composition, or the subject of their predictions. It is manifest that they were largely interpolated by the Christians to a late period; and some of the books can be assigned to no other time but the present. Much, no doubt, was of an older date. It is scarcely credible that the Fathers of this time would quote contemporary forgeries as ancient prophecies. The Jews of Alexandria, who had acquired some taste for Grecian poetry, and displayed some talent for the translation of their sacred books into the Homeric language and metre, had, no doubt, set the example of versifying their own prophecies and of ascribing them to the Sibyls, whose names were universally venerated, as revealing to mankind the secrets of futurity. They may have begun by comparing their own prophecies with these ancient seers, and spoken of the predictions of Isaiah or Ezekiel as their Sibylline verses, which may have been another word for prophetic or oracular.

Milman, Hist. of Christianity, II. 121.

Almost every region of heathenism boasts its Sibyl. Poetic predictions, ascribed to these inspired women, were either published or religiously preserved in the sacred archives of cities. Nowhere were they held in such awful reverence as in Rome. The opening of the Sibylline books was an event of rare occurrence, and only at seasons of fearful disaster or peril.

Milman, Hist. of Christianity, II. 122.

Sibyls, The. Paintings by Michelangelo, alternating with his figures of the prophets on the cooped triangles of the vaulting of the Sistine Chapel, Rome.

Sicily (sis'i-li). [Gr. Σικελία, from Σικελος (L. Siculus), the ancient inhabitants; L. Sicilia, It. Sicilia, F. Sicile, G. Sicilien.] An island in the Mediterranean, belonging to the kingdom of Italy, and forming (with small neighboring islands) a compartimento. Its chief cities are Palermo, Catania, and Messina. It is situated southwest of the mainland of Italy (separated by the Strait of Messina), and is triangular in shape. The general surface is elevated and mountainous; the culminating point is Mount Etna, and the principal ranges are in the north (Peloritani, Nebrodi, and Madonie). The principal plain is Catania. The leading products are wheat, oranges, citrons, olives, lemons, and other fruits, sulphur, silk, and salt. Sicily was formerly famous as the granary of Italy and Rome. It contains 7 provinces—Messina, Catania, Syracuse, Caltanissetta, Palermo, Girgenti, and Trapani. The inhabitants are of mixed descent. The early inhabitants were the Sicani, Siculi, and Elymi; and Phœnician colonies were settled in early times. Greek colonization commenced in the 8th century B. C.; among the chief Greek cities were Syracuse, Catania, Agrigento, Selinus, and Himera. An unsuccessful Carthaginian invasion occurred in 480 B. C., and an Athenian invasion in 415-413. The western part of Sicily was conquered by Carthage in the end of the 5th century B. C. Syracuse was the leading Greek power under Dionysius the Elder, Timoleon, Agathocles, etc., in the 4th century. The island was the scene of important events in the campaigns of Pyrrhus and in the first Punic war. The greater part of it was annexed by Rome in 241. Syracuse and Agrigento were annexed in the second Punic war. Sicily suffered in the Servile Wars of the 2d century B. C., and under the administration of Verres (73-71 B. C.). It was conquered by the Vandals, and passed to the East Goths in the 5th century; was taken from the Goths by the Eastern Empire in the 6th century (the conquest beginning with the successes of Belisarius in 535); was conquered by the Saracens 827-965; was temporarily conquered by the Christians about 1040; and was conquered by the Normans under Robert and Roger Guiscard 1061-1091. Roger II. united Sicily with southern Italy (Sicily this side of the Faro) in 1127, and in 1130 assumed the title of king. The Two Sicilies were taken possession of by the Hohenstaufen emperor Henry VI. in 1194. The Hohenstaufens were overthrown by Charles of Anjou in 1266. The Sicilians revolted against the Angevins in 1282, and Sicily came under the rule of Aragon. It was separated from Aragon in 1296; was reunited with it in 1412; was several times united and separated from Naples, and finally united with it under Spanish rule in 1503; was ceded to Savoy in 1713, and to Austria in 1720; was conquered by Spain in 1734; was united with Naples and ruled by a Bourbon dynasty in 1734; and was separated from Naples and made a separate kingdom under British protection 1806-15. There were unsuccessful risings in 1820, 1836, and 1848-49. The Bourbons were overthrown by the expedition of Garibaldi in 1860, and Sicily was annexed to the dominions of Victor Emmanuel. Area, 9,936 square miles. Population (1892), 3,364,940.

Sickingen (zik'king-en), Franz von. Born near Kreuznach, March 2, 1481; died May 8, 1523. A German knight, influential in the reigns of Maximilian I. and Charles V. He was often at war with the various states, as Worms, Metz, Wurtemberg, etc.; favored the Reformation; and became the head of a league (1522-23) for the forcible introduction of the Reformation and the overthrow of the princes and the ecclesiastical rulers. He besieged Treves in 1522; was opposed by Hesse and the Palatinate; and was besieged in his fortress near Kaiserslautern and mortally wounded.

Sickles (sik'lz), Daniel Edgar. Born at New York, Oct. 20, 1825. An American general and politician. He was admitted to the bar in 1844; and was a Democratic member of Congress from New York 1857-61. At the beginning of the Civil War he raised the Excelsior Brigade of United States Volunteers at New York, and was commissioned colonel of one of the regiments. He served in the Army of the Potomac in the Peninsula campaign; took part in the battle of Antietam; and distinguished himself as a corps commander at Chancellorsville and Gettysburg (where he was severely wounded). He commanded the military district of the Carolinas after the war; was United States minister to Spain 1869-73; and later was president of the New York State Board of Civil Service Commissioners. He was a Democratic member of Congress from New York 1893-95.

Sick Man, The, or Sick Man of the East. A name given to the Turkish empire, in allusion to its decaying condition: first used by the czar Nicholas of Russia in a conversation with the British ambassador Seymour.

Siculi (sik'ū-li). [Gr. Σικελοί.] One of the early peoples of Sicily and southern Italy: probably allied to the Latins. They gave its name to the island.

Sicyon (sish'i-on). [Gr. Σικυών.] In ancient geography, a city in the northern part of the Peloponnesus, Greece, situated near the Gulf of Corinth 10 miles northwest of Corinth. Sicyon was a flourishing commercial center, and was renowned for its art. It was ruled by the dynasty of the Orthagoride in the 7th and 6th centuries B. C., and 251 became a member of the Achaean League. Its site is occupied by the village of Vasilika. The ancient theater, a large and important monument, has recently been excavated by the American School at Athens. At the bottom of the caava there is a row of seats of honor, in the form of benches with backs and arms. Access to the caava from without is facilitated by two Greek vaulted passages. There is a covered underground passage, as at Eretria, from the middle of the orchestra to the interior of the stage-structure.

Sicyonia (sish-i-on'i-ä). In ancient geography, the territory surrounding Sicyon, and bounded by the Gulf of Corinth on the northeast, Corinthia on the east, Argolis and Phliasia on the south, Aegina on the west, and Achaia on the northwest.

Siddim (sid'im). A valley, mentioned in the Old Testament (Gen. xiv. 3, 8, 10), which contained the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah. It has not been identified with certainty.

Siddons (sid'onz), Mrs. (Sarah Kemble). Born at Brecon, Wales, July 5, 1755; died at London, June 8, 1831. A celebrated English tragic actress, daughter of Roger Kemble, a theatrical manager. She was educated at the schools of the town in which Kemble's company played, and Nov. 26, 1773, married William Siddons, an actor. She made her first appearance in London in 1775 as Portia. In 1777 she returned to the provinces, and in 1782 appeared at Drury Lane with extraordinary success as Isabella in Southern's "Fatal Marriage." In 1785 she first appeared as Lady Macbeth, her greatest rôle, and in 1788 appeared as Queen Katharine in her brother's revival of Henry VIII. In 1803 her brother John bought a share of Covent Garden Theatre, and she joined his company, playing there until she left the stage, June 23, 1812, after a remarkable career in her profession. She made a great impression as Jane Shore, as Belvidera in "Venice Preserved," and as Queen Elinor in "King John." Many stories are told of her tragic mien in private life. In 1783 Sir Joshua Reynolds painted her as "the Tragic Muse."

Siddons, Mrs. A portrait by Gainsborough (1784), in the National Gallery, London. The figure is half-length and seated.

Siddons, Mrs., as the Tragic Muse. A painting by Sir Joshua Reynolds (1784), in Grosvenor House, London. The great actress is seated in deep thought, on a throne surrounded by clouds; behind her stand two figures impersonating open and secret violence.

Siddons, Mrs. Scott. Born in India, 1844; died at Paris, Nov. 19, 1896. An English actress. She was the great-granddaughter of the celebrated Mrs. Siddons, and was educated in Germany. She made her first professional appearance at Nottingham, England, as Lady Macbeth, and her début in America as an actress at the Boston Museum about 1868, although she had previously appeared in New York as a dramatic reader.

Side (sī'dē). [Gr. Σιδών.] In ancient geography, a town of Pamphylia, Asia Minor, situated on the Gulf of Pamphylia, about lat. 36° 45' N., long. 31° 25' E., on the site of the modern Eski Adalia. It contains a Roman theater, in part excavated from a hillside and in part built up of masonry. The cavea, greater than a semicircle, has 26 tiers of marble seats below the precinct and 23 above it. A number of vaulted passages lead from the precinct to the exterior. The diameter is 409 feet; that of the orchestra, 125.

He wrote "Discourses Concerning Government" (1698), etc.

Sidney, Mary, Countess of Pembroke. Born in 1557; died in 1621. An English poet, sister of Sir Philip Sidney. She married the Earl of Pembroke in 1577, and in 1580 Sidney, being in disgrace at court, went to stay at Wilton with her. They made a poetical version of the psalms together, and Sidney wrote for her there his "Arcadia," which she prepared for the press and published in 1590, after his death. She also wrote poems, and a tragedy "Antonius." She is the subject of Ben Jonson's well-known epitaph for "Sidney's sister, Pembroke's mother."

Sidney, or Sydney, Sir Philip. Born at Penshurst, Kent, England, Nov. 29, 1554; died at Arnhem, Netherlands, Oct. 7, 1586. An English author and general. He studied at Shrewsbury school and at Christ Church, Oxford, supplementing his scholastic education by several years of travel on the Continent. He was envoy to the emperor Rudolf II. 1576-77; was an officer in the English expedition to the Netherlands under Leicester 1585-86; was appointed governor of Flushing in 1585; and was mortally wounded at the battle of Zutphen Sept. 22, 1586. He wrote the pastoral romance "Arcadia" (1590), the series of sonnets "Astrophel and Stella" (1591), "Defence of Poesie" (1595), etc. A complete edition of his works was published in 1725; his "Complete Poems" were edited by Grosart, in 1873.

Sidney Sussex College. A college of Cambridge University, founded in 1595 by the Countess of Sussex, daughter of Sir William Sidney, on the site of a Franciscan monastery.

Sidon (sī'don). ['Fishingtown.' Gr. Σιδών.] The oldest city of ancient Phœnicia. From the 17th century to about 1100 B. C. it held supremacy in Phœnicia and established most of the Phœnician colonies. Later it was outrivalled by Tyre, but continued to maintain an important position. In 351 B. C. it was destroyed in consequence of a revolt against the Persian king Artaxerxes III. Ochus. It was still a wealthy city about the beginning of the Christian era. During the Crusades it was several times destroyed. At present Sidon is represented by the town of Saida, with about 15,000 inhabitants. The ancient Necropolis, long known and exploited, has yielded numerous monuments of the most diverse ages and civilizations, from the oldest Phœnician, still under Egyptian influence, through the various stages of Greek art. In 1887 an important discovery was made, consisting of an intact subterranean mausoleum of several chambers, containing 22 sarcophagi, several of them bearing polychrome sculptures in relief of the best Greek art, and almost uninjured. The sarcophagi were transported to the museum at Constantinople, where they form one of the most important existing collections of ancient art. The Greek sarcophagi were not executed at Sidon, but were imported from different places and at different times. Their usual form is that of a temple. Four only are completely covered with sculpture; but these four rank with the finest existing productions of Greek art, and are the only sarcophagi known which belong to the best period of sculpture. The oldest is of Lycian form, with Centaurs and Lapiths and hunting-scenes. The second, dating from the beginning of the 4th century B. C., is called "the Sarcophagus of the Weeping Women," from the graceful figures in the intercolumniations of its Ionic colonnade. The third bears varied scenes from the life of an Oriental ruler. The fourth is so splendid that its discoverers may be pardoned for proclaiming it the sarcophagus of Alexander. Four of its six sculptured panels represent hunting- or battle-scenes in which the portrait of Alexander, almost contemporaneous, actually figures. It is no doubt the tomb of an Oriental chief who had enjoyed the companionship of the Macedonian conqueror. See Phœnicia.

Sidonius Apollinaris (sī-dō'nī-us a-pol-i-nā-ris) (properly Caius Sollius Apollinaris Sidonius). Born at Lyons about 430; died in 482 or 484. A Christian author. He was descended from a noble family, received a careful education, and married Papianilla, the daughter of Avitus (afterward emperor). He was appointed governor of Rome by the emperor Anthemius in 467, and afterward raised to the rank of a patrician and senator. He ultimately entered the church, however, and in 472 succeeded Eparchius as bishop of Clermont. His extant works are "Carmina" and "Epistolarum libri IX."

One man alone . . . gives us that more detailed information concerning the thoughts, characters, persons of the actors in the great drama which can make the dry bones of the chronologers live. This is Caius Apollinaris Sidonius, man of letters, imperial functionary, country gentleman and bishop, who, notwithstanding much manifest weakness of character and a sort of epigrammatic dulness of style, is still the most interesting literary figure of the fifth century.

Hadgkin, Italy and her Invaders, II. 298.

Sidra (sid'rā). Gulf of. The largest arm of the Mediterranean, on the northern coast of Africa, situated north of Tripoli and west of Barea; the ancient Syrtis Major. Length, about 260 miles.

Siemens (zē'mens), Werner. Born at Lenthe, near Hannover, Dec. 13, 1816; died at Berlin, Dec. 6, 1892. A German inventor and manufacturer. He entered the Prussian army in 1834, but left the service in 1849. In 1847 he established the firm of Siemens and Halske at Berlin, branches of which were subsequently established at St. Petersburg (1857), London (1858), Vienna (1858), and Tiflis (1863). He was ennobled in 1888. He is noted for his researches in electricity, and was the author of numerous scientific papers.

Siemens (sē'menz; G. pron. zē'mens), Sir William (G. Wilhelm). Born at Lenthe, near Hannover, April 4, 1823; died at London, Nov. 19, 1883. A German-English physicist, engineer, and inventor; brother of Werner Siemens. He settled in England in 1844; became a naturalized British subject in 1859; was elected to the Royal Society in 1862; was president of the British Association; and in 1883 was knighted. His researches relate chiefly to electricity and heat. He published "On the Utilization of Heat and Other Natural Forces" (1878), "The Dynamo-Electric Current and its Steadiness" (1881), and "On the Conservation of Solar Energy" (1883). His "Scientific Works" have been edited by E. F. Bamber (1888).

Siena (sē-ā'nā). A province of Tuscany, Italy. Area, 1,471 square miles. Population (1891), 207,221.

Siena (sē-ā'nā), or Sienna (sē-en'nā). The capital of the province of Siena, Italy, situated in lat. 43° 19' N., long. 11° 19' E.; the ancient Sena Julia or Colonia Julia Senensis. It has considerable trade and manufactures, and is celebrated for its works of art. The cathedral is one of the most notable of Italian pointed buildings, essentially of the 13th century, 289 feet long, 80 feet across nave and aisles, and 170 across the transepts. In the 14th century the plan was formed to make the existing church merely the transept of a grand new cathedral, facing the south, and much was done toward carrying this out, but the work was stopped by the plague of 1356. The rich triple-pedimented front is inlaid in black, red, and white, with painting and gilding; the interior, built throughout of alternate courses of black and white marble, even to the high clustered columns, is very impressive; it is famous for its mosaic and graffito pavement in pictorial designs (the finest work of the kind in existence), and for its hexagonal sculptured pulpit by Niccolò Pisano. In addition, it is full of fine church furniture, and possesses statues by Michelangelo, a noted painting of the Madonna by Duccio, and many beautiful frescoes by Pinturicchio and others. There is a lofty square campanile on the south transept. The Palazzo del Governo, or Piccolomini (now containing the Siense archives), by Rosellino, finished in 1500, is one of the best-proportioned and most effective Renaissance palaces in Tuscany. The Palazzo Pubblico, an imposing 14th-century structure, with traceried windows, arcades, and battlemented roof, is famous for the frescoes which adorn its halls. The Piazza del Campo, churches of San Giovanni and San Domenico, university, Opera del Duomo, Oratorio di San Bernardino, picture-gallery, libraries, house of St. Catherine, fountains, and palaces of Tolomei, Buonisignori, etc., are also notable. Siena was probably a settlement of the Æseonians Gauls. It was made a Roman colony by Augustus; was in the middle ages the capital of a powerful republic, and an important art center; was a stronghold of the Ghibellines, and a rival of Florence, which it defeated at Monte Aperto in 1260; was under the rule of the despot Pandolfo Petrucci about 1500; was besieged and taken by the Florentines and Imperialists in 1555; and was formally incorporated with Tuscany in 1557. It was famous in the development of architecture, painting, and wood-carving. Population (1892), 28,500.

Sienna, Council of. A council of the church held in Sienna 1423-24. It was unproductive of results.

Sienkiewicz (syen-kye'vich). Henryk. Born in Lithuania in 1845. A Polish novelist. He studied at Warsaw, and passed some of his early years in California. Among his works are "Ogniem i mieczem" ("By Fire and Sword"), "Bartek Zwycierca" ("Bartek Victorious"), "Rodzina Polanieckich" (translated as "Children of the Soil"), and "Quo Vadis?"

Sienna. See Sienna.

Sierra (sē-er'ra). [Sp., 'mountain-range': in South America often used for mountainous and open lands, in contradistinction to plains and forest.] A common name in Peru for the region between the central and eastern Cordilleras of the Andes, drained by affluents of the upper Amazon. It was the principal seat of the Inca civilization.

Sierra (sē-er'ra) Blanca. [Sp., 'white mountains.'] The name of three distinct mountain-chains in the Southwest. One is in southern Colorado, and contains the highest peak in that State; another is in southeastern New Mexico, and rises to about 12,000 feet; and the third is in eastern Arizona (its highest peaks are not over 11,000 feet).

Sierra Capitana (kā-pē-tū'nā). [Sp., 'captain (i. e. 'chief') mountains.'] A mountain-range in middle New Mexico, having an elevation of over 10,000 feet. It lies between the Pecos River and the Rio Grande.

Sierra de Dolores (dā dō-lō'res). [Sp., 'mountains of our Lady of Sorrow.'] A mountain-chain south of Santa Fé, New Mexico, also called Placer Viejo ('Old Placer'). Its altitude is about 9,000 feet. It contains placers of gold of some value, but not productive on account of lack of water.

Sierra de Gredos (dā grā'GROS). A mountain-range in central Spain, in the provinces of Avila and Cáceres. Highest point, 8,693 feet.

Sierra de Guadalupe (dā gwā'fhā-lō'pā). A mountain-range in the province of Cáceres, western Spain.

Sierra de Guadarrama (gwā'fhār-rā'mā). A mountain-range in central Spain, north and northwest of Madrid. It divides northern from southern Spain. Highest point, 7,888 feet.

Sierra de los Ladrones (dā lōs lā'thrō'nes). [Sp., 'mountains of the thieves.'] A picturesque cluster of mountains in New Mexico, southwest of Albuquerque, about 9,000 feet high. In the beginning of the 18th century it was a favorite resort of the Apaches; hence, probably, the name, as these marauders were accustomed to retire thither with their booty.

Sierra de San Francisco (sān frān-thēs'kō). See San Francis Mountain.

Sierra de Santa Rita (dā sāt'tā rē'tā). A high range in southern Arizona, southeast of the town of Tucson.

Sierra Florida (flō-rē'fhā). [Sp., 'blooming mountains.'] A mountain cluster, a little over 7,000 feet high, rising a short distance from Deming in southeastern New Mexico. Its slopes are very barren, but the gorges in its interior are quite rich in flowers; hence the name.

Sierra Leone (lē-ō'nē, locally lē-ō'n'; Sp. pron. lā-ō'nā). A British colony on the coast of western Africa. Capital, Freetown. It includes Sierra Leone proper and various territories under British protection, and is situated northwest of Liberia, about lat. 6° 55' 10" N. The peninsula of Sierra Leone is traversed by hills. The chief exports are palm products, rubber, nuts, etc. The inhabitants are mostly negroes of various races. The establishment of a colony of liberated slaves here in 1787 was unsuccessful; but a successful attempt was made in 1791, under the patronage of Wilberforce and others. Sierra Leone became a crown colony in 1807. Area, about 30,000 square miles. Population (1897), about 150,000.

Sierra Madre (mā'fhā). [Sp., 'mother' 'mountains,' i. e. 'main range.'] A mountain-range in Mexico. In an extended sense the name is applied to the Rocky Mountain system in New Mexico.

Sierra Magdalena (māg-dā-lā'nā). The highest mountain-range in southern New Mexico, west of the Rio Grande. Its greatest elevation is about 11,000 feet. It is very rich in silver ores.

Sierra Morena (mō-rā'nā). [Sp., 'brown mountains.'] A mountain-range in southern Spain, stretching nearly east and west on the border of Ciudad Real on the north and Jaen on the south. The name is sometimes extended to include the chains westward to the frontier of Portugal.

Sierra Nevada (nā-vī'fhā). [Sp., 'snowy mountains.'] The highest mountain-range in Spain. It is situated in the southern part of Andalusia, south and southeast of Granada, nearly parallel with the coast. Highest peak, Mulhacen (11,660 feet).

Sierra Nevada (ne-vī'dj). A collection of mountain-ranges in California, nearly parallel to the Pacific coast. It is continued by the Cascade Mountains on the north, and on the south merges with the Coast Range near the Tejon Pass. It forms the eastern border of the great valley of California, and is famous for its grand scenery (big trees, Yosemite Valley, etc.). Highest summit, Mount Whitney (14,977 feet).

Siete Partidas (sē-ā'tā pār-tē'fhās), Las. [Sp., 'The Seven Laws.'] A code of Spanish law, compiled under the direction of Alfonso X. of Castile.

Sievers (zē'vers), Georg Eduard. Born Nov. 25, 1850. A noted German philologist, professor successively at Jena (1871-83), Tübingen (1883-87), Halle (1887-92), and Leipzig (1892). Among his works on Teutonic philology are "Der Heljand und die angelsächsische Genesis" (1875), "Angelsächsische Grammatik" ("Anglo-Saxon Grammar"; 2d ed. 1886), etc.

Sievershausen (zē'vers-hou-zen). A village in Prussia, 17 miles east of Hannover. Here, July 9, 1853, Maurice, elector of Saxony (who was mortally wounded in the battle), defeated the margrave Albert of Brandenburg.

Sieyès (sē-ā-yās'), Comte Emmanuel Joseph, generally called Abbé Sieyès. Born at Fréjus, France, May 3, 1748; died at Paris, June 20, 1836. A French statesman and publicist. He was the son of a bourgeois family at Fréjus; received his preliminary education from the Jesuits of his native town and the Doctrinaire Fathers at Draguignan; studied theology at St. Sulpice; and became vicar-general of the Bishop of Chartres. He was in thorough sympathy with the aspirations of the reform party in the political agitation which preceded the French Revolution; and his brochure "Qu'est-ce que le tiers état?" created a tremendous sensation, furnishing a program for the popular leaders in the initial steps of the Revolution. He was elected deputy of the third estate in 1789; took an important part in the organization and early measures of the National Assembly; was a deputy to the Convention 1792-95; was a member of the Council of Five Hundred; was ambassador to Berlin 1798-99; became a member of the Directory in 1799; and was one of the chief organizers of the coup d'état of the 18th Brumaire of that year, which placed Napoleon at the head of the government as first consul. He was later president of the Senate; was created a count of the empire; and became a member of the French Academy. He went into exile on the restoration of the Bourbons, and returned to France in 1830.

Sigel (sē'gel). Franz. Born at Sinsheim, Baden, Nov. 18, 1824; died at New York, Aug. 21, 1902. A German-American general. He took a leading part in the Baden insurrections of 1848 and 1849, but escaped capture, and, after having lived in Switzerland and England, came to the United States in 1852, settling at St. Louis as a teacher in a German institute in 1858. On the outbreak of the Civil War he organized a regiment of United States volunteers of which he became colonel. He won the battle of Carthage in 1861; commanded a wing of the army at Pea Ridge and at the second battle of Bull Run in 1862; and was commander of the Department of West Virginia in 1864, being defeated by Breckinridge at Newmarket. He was United States pension agent at New York under Cleveland 1885-89.

Sigeum (si-jē'um). [Gr. Σίγεον.] In ancient geography, a promontory and town in the Troad, Asia Minor, at the entrance to the Hellespont. It was the legendary station of the Greek fleet in the Trojan war.

Sigismund (sij'is-mund; G. pron. zē'gis-mönt). Born 1361; died Dec. 9, 1437. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, son of Charles IV. and brother of Wenzel. He received the margravate of Brandenburg in 1378; married the heiress of Hungary and became king of that country in 1387; was defeated by the Turks at Nicopolis in 1396; was deposed by the Hungarians in 1401; but recovered the throne by force; succeeded Wenzel as emperor in 1411; and on Wenzel's death in 1419 succeeded to the crown of Bohemia, where, however, his authority was set at naught by the Hussites until shortly before his death. Among the events of his reign were the Council of Constance, where he had Huss burned in spite of a safe-conduct; the Hussite war; and the granting of Brandenburg to Frederick of Saxe-Coburg (1415). He was crowned by the Pope in 1433. He was the last emperor of the house of Luxemburg.

Sigismund I. Born Jan. 1, 1467; died at Cracow, April 1, 1548. King of Poland 1506-48. He waged war successfully with Russia, Wallachia, and Moldavia, and was a capable and energetic ruler.

Sigmund. See Sigismund.

Signal (sēn-yōl'), Émile. Born at Paris in 1804; died there, Oct. 17, 1892. A French historical and genre painter. He was a pupil of Blondel and Gros, and won the grand prix de Rome in 1830. His "Woman taken in Adultery" was bought for the Luxembourg in 1840. He executed a good deal of work for the Madeleine in Paris and other churches.

Signorelli (sēn-yō-rel'li), Luca di Egidio di Ventura de'. Born at Cortona in 1441; died there in 1523. An Italian painter. He was the pupil of his uncle, Lazzaro Vasari, and later of Piero della Francesca, who is supposed to have taken him to Rome with him. In 1472 he executed his first independent work, the decoration of the Chapel of Santa Barbara in San Lorenzo at Arezzo, which was followed by other works in that city. As a fresco-painter his career is marked by great works—the decoration of the Sacristy of Loretto, that of the Sistine Chapel at Rome (before 1484), and that of the Chapel of the Virgin at Orvieto. In 1499 he was invited to complete the work begun by Fra Angelico 60 years before at Orvieto, which resulted in the great frescoes especially associated with his name.

Sigourney (sig'er-ni), Mrs. (Lydia Huntly). Born at Norwich, Conn., Sept. 1, 1791; died at Hartford, Conn., June 10, 1865. An American poet and miscellaneous writer. Her works include "Letters to Young Ladies" (1833), "Pocahontas, and Other Poems" (1841), "Pleasant Memories of Pleasant Lands" (1842).

Sigsbee (sig'sbē), Charles Dwight. Born at Albany, N. Y., Jan. 16, 1845. An American naval officer. He was graduated from the United States Naval Academy in 1863; served under Farragut at the battle of Mobile Bay, Aug. 5, 1864; and was promoted commander in 1882, and captain in 1897. He commanded the United States battleship Maline at the time of her destruction in Havana harbor, Feb. 15, 1898. During the Spanish-American war he commanded the auxiliary cruiser St. Paul, and was later transferred to the Texas.

Sikhim, or Sikkim (sik'im). A native state in northern India. Capital, Tumlung. It is bounded by Tibet on the north, Bhutan on the east, British India on the south, and Nepal on the west, and is comprised within the Himalaya region. The inhabitants are Lepchas or Rong. It is governed by a raja, subsidized by the British. It became a British protectorate in 1889-90. Area, estimated, 2,000 square miles. Population (1891), 30,458.

Sikhs (sicks). [From Hind. Sikh, lit. a 'disciple': a distinctive name of the disciples of Nanak Shah, who founded the sect.] The members of a politico-religious community in India, founded near Lahore about 1500 as a sect based on the principles of monotheism and human brotherhood. Under their hereditary theocratic chiefs the Sikhs were organized into a political and military force, collectively called Khalsa, 'the portion' (of God), while every member received the surname of Singh (in Sanskrit śinha, 'lion'). This military organization was especially due to Govind Singh. Social inequality was abolished. Of the Hindu usages only the respect paid to cows was retained. Every one was an unbeliever who had not been admitted to the Khalsa by having five of the inflated drink with him the sherbet of the Pahlul. A Sikh was forbidden to return the salutation of a Hindu, and was bound to kill a Mussulman on meeting him. The holy war was his vocation. The Sikh soldier prayed to his sword. Govind Singh struggled with the Moguls 30 years, and then accepted a command in the imperial army. He fell by an Afghan assassin in 1708, appointing no successor and declaring the Granth (see Adi-Granth) to be the future guru. After him an ascetic named Banda was the chief of the Khalsa. Under him the Sikhs were almost annihilated by the armies of Farukhsir. Banda himself was captured, compelled for a week to witness the torture of 740 companions (of whom no one winced) and the death of his own son, and then tortured to death with red-hot pliers, while he praised God for choosing him to be the instrument of his vengeance. After Banda's death in 1716, the Akalis, 'the faithful of the Eternal,' became the guardians of the sanctuary at Amritsar, where the Adi-Granth was kept. The Gurmata, 'council of the guru,' held supreme authority. The political history of the Sikhs ended in 1849, when the English, after a violent struggle, annexed the Panjab. The Sikhs have now ceased their religious fanaticism, and are a valuable contingent of the British armies. See Adi Granth and Nanak.

Sikh Wars. Two wars between the British under Sir Hugh Gough and the Sikhs. The Sikhs invaded British territory in Dec., 1845, and were defeated in the battles of Mudki, Ferozshah, Aliwal, and Sohraon. Lahore was taken by the British, and peace was concluded March 9, 1846. The second war began with the massacre of British officers at Multan in April, 1848. A drawn battle at Chillianwalla was followed by a British victory at Gujrat (Feb. 22, 1849), which completely broke the power of the Sikhs, and led to the annexation of the Panjab to British India.

Sikiang (sē-kē-āng'). A river in southern China which rises in Yunnan and flows into the China Sea. Canton and Hong-Kong are in its delta.

Sikino (sē-kē-nō or sē-kē-nō). An island of the Cyclades, Greece, 19 miles south of Paros; the ancient Sicinos (Gr. Σικινος). Length, 9 miles.

Sikkim. See Sikkim.

Sikoku. See Shikoku.

Siksika (sik'sik-ā). A confederacy of North American Indians, one of the most important still existing in the Northwest, consisting of 3 tribes, the Siksika proper or Blackfeet, the Kino or Blood, and the Piegan. Their country is in northern Montana and the adjacent part of Canada, extending from the Rocky Mountains to the junction of Milk River with the Missouri, and from the Muscle Shell River in Montana to the Belly and South Saskatchewan rivers in Canada. Their present number is about 7,000. The Siksika proper and the Kino are chiefly in Canada, and the Piegans at Blackfoot agency, Montana. The name is translated 'Black feet,' with several traditional explanations. See Algonquian.

Sil (sél). A river in northwestern Spain which joins the Minho 9 miles northeast of Orense. Length, about 125 miles.

Sila (sē'lā), or Monte Nero (mon'te nā'rō). An extensive wooded region in the Apennines of Calabria, southern Italy, situated east of Cosenza. It rises to the height of 6,200 feet. Length, about 37 miles.

Silarus (sil'ā-rus). The ancient name of the river Sele in southern Italy. Near it, in 71 B. C., Spartacus was defeated and slain by the Romans under Crassus.

Silbury Hill (sil'bu-ri hil). A large barrow near Avebury, in Wiltshire, England. Height, 130 feet.

Silcher (zil'cher), Friedrich. Born at Schnaith, Württemberg, June 27, 1789; died at Tübingen, Aug. 26, 1860. A German composer of popular songs, director of music at the University of Tübingen from 1817.

Silchester (sil'ches-tēr). A village near Basingstoke in Hampshire, England, on the site of the ancient Roman town of Calleva. Many remains of antiquity have been discovered here.

It is a speaking fact that of what must have been one of the greatest Roman cities of Britain we have absolutely no history whatever. Antiquaries are, we believe, now pretty well agreed that Silchester is the Roman Calleva Atrabatum—in Gaul the place might have been called Arras and its district Artois—and it is so marked in Dr. Guest's map. But this is merely a geographical and not an historical fact. Calleva is simply a name in the Itineraries; nothing that we ever heard of is recorded to have happened there. Freeman, English Towns, p. 159.

Silence (sil'ēns). A dull country justice in the second part of Shakspeare's "King Henry IV." He is the cousin of Shallow, and prides himself on having "been merry twice and once ere now."

Silent Woman, The. See Epicæne.

Silenus (si-lē'nus). [Gr. Σελήνιος.] In Greek mythology, a divinity of Asiatic origin, the foster-father of Bacchus, and leader of the satyrs, but very frequently merely one of a number of kindred attendants in the Dionysiac thiasus. He was represented as a robust full-bearded old man, hairy and with pointed ears, frequently in a state of intoxication, often riding on an ass and carrying a cantharus or other wine-vessel.

Silenus and Bacchus. A Greco-Roman group in marble, in the Glyptothek, Munich. Silenus, as a strong, bearded man, nude, his head wreathed with ivy, holds the smiling infant in his arms.

Silenus and Satyrs. A painting by Rubens, in the Old Pinakothek at Munich. Silenus reeks along, supported by a satyr and a negro and attended by a train of satyrs and bacchantes, who are accompanied by a tiger and two goats.

Silesia (si-lē'shiā). [NL. Silesia, F. Silésie, G.

Schlesien, a name of Slavic origin, earlier Sleeanzane, Zlesane, Pol. Zlesaki.] A large region of central Europe, mainly in the upper basin of the Oder, northeast of the Sudetic Mountains. Its early inhabitants were Slavs. The possession of it was disputed between Poland and Bohemia. It became Polish in the 10th century; was separated from Poland in 1163; was divided into various duchies ruled by branches of the Polish dynasty of Piast; gradually became largely Germanized; and was incorporated with Bohemia in 1355. With Bohemia it passed to the house of Hapsburg. It suffered in the Hussite, Thirty Years', Silesian, and Napoleonic wars. It was conquered by Frederick the Great 1741-42, and the larger part of it was ceded by Austria to Prussia in 1742; the cession was confirmed in 1763.

Silesia, or Austrian Silesia. A crownland and titular duchy belonging to the Cisleithan division of Austria-Hungary. Chief town, Troppan. It is bounded by Prussian Silesia on the north, Galicia on the east, Hungary and Moravia on the south, and mainly by Moravia on the west. The surface is largely mountainous, being traversed by branches of the Sudetic and Carpathian mountains. Silesia has mineral wealth in coal, iron, etc., and flourishing manufactures. It sends 12 members to the Reichsrath. The inhabitants are Germans, Poles, Czechs, Slovaks, and Moravians. The crownland comprises the part of ancient Silesia not conquered by Prussia. It was united to Moravia until 1849. Area, 1,987 square miles. Population (1890), 605,649.

Silesia, or Prussian Silesia. A southeastern province of Prussia. Capital, Breslau. It is bounded by Brandenburg on the northwest, Posen and Russian Poland on the northeast, Austrian Silesia, Moravia, and Bohemia on the south, and Bohemia, Saxony, and Prussian Saxony on the west. It comprises most of the ancient duchy of Silesia, Glatz, part of Upper Lusatia, etc. The surface is mountainous and hilly in the southwest and south, and level generally in the north and northeast. It is traversed by the Oder. Prussian Silesia is noted for its mineral wealth, especially for coal, iron, and zinc, and is one of the chief manufacturing provinces of the kingdom. Among its leading industries are metal-working and manufactures of machinery, linen, cotton, woolen, etc. It contains three government districts: Liegnitz, Breslau, and Oppeln. The majority of the inhabitants are Germans, but there are many Poles and some Czechs, Moravians, and Wends. Area, 15,557 square miles. Population (1890), 4,224,458.

Silesian (si-lé'shian) Poetical Schools. In German literature, two groups of minor poets in the 17th century—one composed of followers of Opitz, the other of followers of Hofmann von Hofmannswaldau.

Silesian Wars. Three wars waged by Frederick the Great of Prussia against Austria for the possession of Silesia. In the first war (1740-42) Prussia was allied with Saxony, Bavaria, and France, and Austria with Great Britain. Frederick invaded Silesia in 1740, and the Prussians were victorious at Mollwitz in 1741, and at Chotshitz in 1742. By the peace of Breslau (June, 1742) the greater part of Silesia was ceded to Prussia. In the war of 1744-45 Austria was aided by Saxony. Frederick invaded Bohemia and took Prague, but had to fall back into Saxony in 1744. Prussian victories were won at Hohenfriedberg, Sorr, and Kesselsdorf in 1745. The possession of Silesia by Prussia was confirmed by the peace of Dresden, Dec. 25, 1745. The third of the Silesian wars is the Seven Years' War (which see).

Silesius, Angelus. See Angelus Silesius.

Silistria (si-lis'tri-ā). A town in Bulgaria, situated on the Danube in lat. 44° 7' N., long. 27° 16' E.: the ancient Durostorus or Durostorum. Silistria and its vicinity have been the field of many military operations, especially between the Russians and Turks. It was attacked by the Russians in 1773; taken by them in 1810; besieged by them in 1828; besieged and taken in 1829; unsuccessfully besieged in 1854; and occupied by them in 1878. The fortifications were razed in 1878. Population (1887), 11,414.

Silkworm (silkw'werm), Sir Diaphanous. A courtier "of a most elegant thread," in Jonson's comedy "The Magnetick Lady."

Silly Billy (sil'i bil'i). A nickname of William IV., king of Great Britain.

Siloam (si-lō'am), or Siloah (si-lō'ā). [Heb. Shiloach, sending.] A pool at the southeast end of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 15, "by the king's garden"), fed by the waters of a spring of the Gihon (the modern Virgin's Fount), which were conducted to it through a tunnel. It consisted of several artificial channels and basins which supplied Jerusalem with water. The pool of Siloam which is still in existence formerly had an outlet in the southeast called the "lower pond," and is now called Birket-el-Hambra ('red pond'). Another part of the former water-reservoir is now occupied by gardens. The Virgin's Fount is intermittent. In 1880 the oldest Hebrew inscription known was discovered in the rocky aqueduct. It gives the length of the channel, and, among other details, mentions that the workmen began the boring from both ends. The Arabs called Siloam Ain Silwan.

Hardly less interesting has been the discovery of the inscription of Siloam, which reveals to us the very characters used by the Jews in the time of Isaiah, perhaps even in the time of Solomon himself. The discovery has cast a flood of light on the early topography of Jerusalem, and has made it clear as the daylight that the Jews of the royal period were not the rude and barbarous people it has been the fashion of an unbelieving criticism to assume, but a cultured and literary population.

Sagee, Anc. Monuments, p. 5.

Sils (zils). The name of several villages in the canton of Grisons, Switzerland. Sila in the Upper Engadine is situated 8 miles southwest of Poutresina. Near it is Silser See, formed by the Inn, 4½ miles long.

Simon. A tanner of Joppa at whose house St. Peter resided.

Simon, surnamed Magus ('the Magician'). A sorcerer of Samaria, represented in Acts viii, as having been converted by Philip, and as seeking to purchase miraculous powers with money. In later accounts he is represented as the founder of a heretical sect. The legend of Doctor Faustus contains traces of the legends of Simon and Helena, his companion.

Simon probably was one of that class of adventurers which abounded at this period, or like Apollonius of Tyana and others at a later time, with whom the opponents of Christianity attempted to confound Jesus and his apostles. His doctrine was Oriental in its language and in its pretensions. He was the first Eon or Emanation, or rather perhaps the first manifestation, of the primal Deity. He assumed not merely the title of the Great Power or Virtue of God, but all the other appellations—the Word, the Perfection, the Paraclete, the Almighty—the whole combined attributes of the Deity. He had a companion, Helena, according to the statement of his enemies a beautiful prostitute, whom he found at Tyre, who became in like manner the first conception (the Emana) of the Deity; but who, by her conjunction with matter, had been enslaved to its malignant influence, and, having fallen under the power of evil angels, had been in a constant state of transmigration, and, among other mortal bodies, had occupied that of the famous Helen of Troy.

Milman, Hist. of Christianity, II. 61.

Simon. The mayor of Queenborough in Middleton's play of that name.

The comic figure is the tanner Simon, the mayor of Queenborough, who is cozened by a company of pretended comedians while looking on at what he takes to be a play.

Simonides (si-mōn'i-dēz), or Semonides (se-mōn'i-dēz), of Amorgos. [Gr. Σιμωνίδης.] Born in Samos; lived about 660 B. C. A famous Greek iambic poet. Fragments of his poems have been preserved (Bergk's "Poete lyrici Græci").

The next poet of this period is Simonides, or, as some call him, Semonides, son of Krines, of Samos, who led a colony to the island of Amorgos, after which the poet is called, to distinguish him from the later Simonides of Keos. Here he dwelt in the town of Minoa. The chronologists place him about O. 29 or 30 (660 B. C.), and make him contemporary with, if not later than, Archilochus. Though chiefly celebrated as one of the earliest iambic poets, he wrote the "Archeology of Samos," in two books of elegiacs, of which no trace now remains. About forty fragments of his iambic verse are to be found in Bergk's collection, but only two of them are of any importance. One (25 lines) reflects on the restlessness and trouble of life, and recommends equanimity in a spirit of sad wisdom. The other (120 lines) is the famous satire on women, comparing them to sundry animals, owing to their having been created of these respective natures.

Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I. 161.

Simonides of Ceos. Born at Iulis, island of Ceos, Greece, 556 B. C.; died at Syracuse about 469-467 B. C. A noted Greek poet. He lived in Athens, Thessaly, Syracuse, and elsewhere, and wrote epigrams, lyrics, threnodies, etc.

Simurgh (sē-mōrgh'). [From si, thirty, and murgh, bird (as having the size of thirty birds).] In the Shahnamah, the huge bird that cared for and reared the infant Zal when, in consequence of his white hair, he had been exposed by his father Sam near Mount Alburz.

The child remained thus in this place one day and one night without shelter. Sometimes he sucked his thumb, sometimes he uttered cries. The little ones of the Simurgh being hungry, the mighty bird rose from his nest into the air. He saw a child who needed milk and was crying, he saw the earth that seemed like a surging sea. Thorns formed the cradle of the child, his nurse was the earth, his body was naked, his mouth devoid of milk. Around him was the soil black and burned, above the sun that had become fiery hot. Oh, why were his father and his mother not tigers? He would then perhaps have found a shelter against the sun. God gave to Simurgh an impulse of pity, so that the bird did not think of devouring that child. He came down from the clouds, took him in his talons, and carried him from the burning rock. He bore him swiftly to Mount Alburz, where was the nest of his family. He bore him to his little ones that they might see him, and that his mournful voice might prevent them from deprecating him, for God granted him his favors, since he was predestined to enjoy life. The Simurgh and his little ones looked at this child, whose blood was streaming from his two eyes. They surrounded him with marvellous tenderness, they were astonished at the beauty of his countenance. The Simurgh chose the tenderest veision, that his little guest, who had no milk, might suck blood. So a long time passed during which the child remained hidden in this place. When the child had grown, a long time still passed upon this mountain. He became a man like a lofty cypress, his breast was like a hill of silver, his stature like a reed.

Shahnamah, Reign of Minuchihr.

Simusir (sē-mō-sēr'). One of the Kurile Islands, situated in lat. 47° 3' N., long. 151° 53' E.

Sinai (sī'nā or sī'nī). [From Sin, the Babylonian moon-god (?).] The main mountain group of the Sinaitic peninsula; the mountain (called also Horeb) near which the Israelites encamped and whence the law was given to Moses. The identity of the latter is not certain. See Sinaitic Peninsula.

Sinai, Convent of, or of St. Catherine. A convent on Mount Sinai, consisting of a labyrinth of buildings and courts inclosed by a fortified wall measuring about 209 by 235 feet. The chief interest is in the great Byzantine church, built in the reign of Justinian, but often altered since. It has narthex, nave, and aisles divided by granite columns, and semi-domed apse with superb mosaics, on gold ground, of the Transfiguration and other subjects. The iconostasis is richly sculptured, and adorned with curious Russian icons. See Sinaitic Peninsula.

Sinaitic (sī-nā-it'ik) Peninsula. A peninsula situated between the Gulf of Suez and the Gulf of Akaba. In the north of the peninsula is the desert Paran (modern et-Tih), a desolate limestone plateau, bounded on the south by the Jebel-et-Tih (4,000 feet high). This is joined in the south by a tract of low sandstone mountains, ravines, and valleys rich in minerals which had been worked as early as 3000 B. C. Then rises the barren, rugged, and majestic triangle of the Sinai Mountain, the Jebel-et-Tur or Tur-Sinai, formed of masses of granite rock and gneiss, intermingled with diorites and porphyries. In this mountain-chain are to be distinguished the following groups: in the northwest is the Jebel-Serbal (6,731 feet high), overhanging the coast plain el-Koah and the Wady Feiran, the most fertile spot of the peninsula. From here through the Wady esh-Sheikh in the southeast appears the Jebel-Musa ('mountain of Moses'), or Sinai proper, which embraces the Jebel-Musa itself (7,362 feet high, and in the south the highest point of the peninsula) and the Jebel Katherine ('mountain of St. Catherine') (8,538 feet high). In the southwest rises the third and last group, the Jebel Um-Shomar ('the watch or guard') (over 8,000 feet high), in the neighborhood of el-Koah. The Jebel-Musa is generally thought to be the mountain of the law (Lepsius and Ebers claim the distinction for the Serbal), and the plain er-Rahah, north of the Musa group, to be the valley in which the Israelites camped during their sojourn at Sinai. The Wady er-Rahah is joined in a right angle from the northeast by the Wady ed-Deir, while to the southeast of the Musa stretches the high plateau Wady es-Sebaiyeh. The western ridge of the Musa is the Jebel el-Humr ('the red mountain'), from which the St. Catherine Mountain in the south rises; the eastern ridge is the Jebel ed-Deir ('mountain of the monastery'). In the Wady Shurib, or Jethro valley, between the Musa and ed-Deir, the monastery of St. Catherine is situated, with its beautiful gardens. Tradition attributes its foundation to the emperor Justinian (527-565), and it was originally dedicated to the remembrance of the Transfiguration. Its present name was obtained when the relics of St. Catherine were transferred thither. The monastery contains at present only 20-30 monks instead of the 300-400 of former times. It became celebrated in recent years by the discovery of the Codex Sinaiticus (the Greek version of the Old Testament and the Greek New Testament), made in it by Tischendorf in 1844. The Sinaitic peninsula is, as a whole, barren. The mountains are naked, and the valleys are dry river-beds. There are, however, exceptions, as the lovely Wady Feiran and other oases. The present population of the peninsula consists of about 6,000 Bedouins.

Sinaloa, or Cinaloa (sē-nā-lō'ā). 1. A state of Mexico, bounded by Sonora on the northwest, Chihuahua and Durango on the northeast, Jalisco on the southeast, and the Pacific and the Gulf of California on the southwest. Sinclair (sing'klēr or sin-klār'), Catherine. Born at Thurso Castle, Caithness, April 17, 1800; died Aug. 6, 1864. A Scottish novelist and miscellaneous writer, daughter of Sir John Sinclair. She was supervisor of a charitable institution for widows of officers of the army and navy, and was active in good works. She wrote "Modern Accomplishments" (1835), "Modern Society" (1836), "Holiday House" (1839), "Modern Flirtations" (1841), "Beatrice" (a "Protestant" novel, over 40,000 copies of which were sold within 16 months of its publication in 1852), etc.

Sinclair, Sir John. Born at Thurso Castle, Caithness, Scotland, May 10, 1754; died Dec. 21, 1835. A Scottish agriculturist, financial writer, and politician. He was educated at Edinburgh University; became a member of the Faculty of Advocates; and was later called to the English bar. He was a member of Parliament 1784-1811. He developed greatly the resources of Caithness. He wrote a "History of the Public Revenue of the British Empire" (1785-89), "Statistical Account of Scotland" (1791-99), etc.

Sind (sind). One of the names of the river Indus.

Sind (river in Gwalior). See Sindh.

Sind, or Scinde, or Scinde, or Sindh (sind). A province of British India, comprised in the governorship of Bombay. It is bounded by Panjab, Bhawalpur, and Rajputana on the east; the Ran and Cutch on the south; the Indian Ocean on the southwest; and Baluchistan on the west. It contains the districts Frontier, Shikarpur, Hyderabad, Karachi, Thar, and Parkar. The chief towns are Karachi, Hyderabad, and Shikarpur. The inhabitants are chiefly Sindia and Hindu. It was invaded by Alexander the Great; was conquered by Mahmud of Ghazni; formed part of the Mogul empire and of Nadir Shah's dominions; was governed later by amers; and was conquered by Sir Charles Napier in 1843, and annexed to British India. Area, 47,789 square miles. Population (1891), 2,871,774.

Sinbad (sind'bad) the Sailor. A character in the story of that name in the "Arabian Nights' Entertainments." He is a wealthy citizen of Bagdad, called "the sailor" because of his seven wonderful voyages, in which he discovers a roc's egg and the valley of diamonds, escapes twice from the Anthropophagi, is buried alive, kills the Old Man of the Sea (a monster which got on his back and would not dismount), is the bearer of a letter and gifts from the King of the Indies to Harun-al-Rashid, and is sent back by that monarch with his acknowledgment of the letter. During this last voyage he finds a valley filled with the dead bodies of elephants, from which he obtains much ivory. Sometimes spelled Sinbad.

Well known in Europe as having the history of his voyages incorporated in the Thousand and One Nights, but they form in Arabic a distinct work, which Baron Walckenaer (in "Nouvelles Annales des Voyages," tome LIII, p. 6) regards as of equal value with those of Soliman and Abu Said. The voyages belong to the 9th century, when the commerce of the Arabs under the khalfis of Bagdad was at its highest activity. In his first voyage Sinbad reaches the country of the maharaja. . . . In Sinbad's second voyage mention is made of the kingdom of Riha (the Malay Peninsula according to some), and the manner of the preparation of camphor, produced in the mountain forests there, is accurately described. In the third voyage the island of Silaheth is mentioned. In the fourth he was carried to a country (Malabar) where he found men gathering pepper, and from it he went to the island of Nacous (the Nicobars?) and on to Kela (Quedah or Keydah?). In the fifth voyage he is shipwrecked on the island (i. e. country) of the Old Man of the Sea, probably somewhere on the Konkani coast. Thence he crossed the sea to the Maldives, and back again to the pepper country of Malabar, passing on to the peninsula of Comorin, where he found the aloes-wood called santy, and afterwards to the pearl-fisheries of the Gulf of Manaar, whence he traveled back to Bagdad. In the sixth voyage he visited an island (i. e. country) where were superb trees of the kinds named santy and comary, and the island of Serendib (Ceylon), which was also the limit of his seventh and last voyage. Balfour, Cyclopaedia of India.

The story of Polyphemus is in the third voyage of Sinbad. Other parts of the adventures of that bold manner seem to be borrowed from the History of Aristomenes in Pausanias. Dunlop, Hist. Prose Fiction, II, 508.

Sindh, or Sind (sind). A river in Gwalior, India, which joins the Jumna about 70 miles west of Cawnpore. Length, about 225 miles.

Sion College. A London college, founded in 1623 by the Rev. Dr. White as a college and almshouse. In 1834 the almshouse was abolished. In 1886 a new building was formally opened. It is situated toward the east end of the Victoria Embankment. It contains the most valuable theological library in London, numbering 60,000 volumes. The original buildings were on the foundation of an old priory near the London Wall.

Siout. See Siat.

Siouan (sō'an). [See Sioux.] A linguistic stock of North American Indians: so called from the Sioux or Dakota, its principal division. The former habitat of this family included parts of British North America and of each of the following States and Territories: Montana, Wyoming, North and South Dakota, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Nebraska, Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, Oklahoma, Indian Territory, Mississippi, the Carolinas, the Virginias, and Kentucky. The Dakota tribes have been the most warlike of this stock. They have been hostile not only to white settlers and to Indians of other stocks (especially the Ojibwa and Pawnee), but even to tribes of their own stock, such as the Crow, Hidatsa, Mandan, and Omaha. The principal Siouan divisions are: (1) The Dakota division, including the Dakota tribes and the Assiniboina. (2) The Duglha division, including the Ponka, Omaha, Kwapa, Osage, and Kansas tribes. (3) The Tetewee division, to which belong the Iowas, Missouris, and Oto tribes. (4) The Winnebago. (5) The Mandan. (6) The Hidatsa division, including the Hidatsa and Absaroka tribes. (7) The Tutelo and cognate tribes. (8) The Biloxi. (9) The Kataba group, including several Carolina tribes. In addition to these, there was a Virginia division to which belonged many tribes whose names were recorded by Captain John Smith. The present number of the Siouan stock is about 43,400, of whom about 2,204 are in British North America, the rest being in the United States.

Sioux (sü). [A French corruption of the Algonkin word nabooe-siway, the snake-like ones or enemies.] See Dakota.

Sipand (si-pend'). In the Shahnamah, the fortress in the siege of which Nariman, father of Sam, lost his life, and which was taken and burned by Rustam, his great-grandson, to avenge him. The mountain is described as steep on all sides, with only one road and gate leading to its summit. It has been identified with Qala-i-safaid, near Shiraz. See Rustam.

Sipan Dagh (sē-pān' däg'). A mountain in Armenia, Turkey, north of Lake Van. Height, about 12,000 feet.

Siphnos (sif'nos). [Gr. Σίφνος.] An island of the Cyclades, Greece, situated in the Ægean Sea about lat. 37° N., long. 24° 44' E.; the modern Sifanto, Siphanto, or Sipheno. It was formerly noted for its mines of gold and silver. Length, 10 miles. Population, about 4,900.

Sipibos (sē-pē'bōs). An Indian tribe of Peru, on the Ucayale River between lats. 6° and 8° S. They belong to the Pamó stock, were gathered into missions during the 18th century, but relapsed into barbarism, and are now nearly extinct. See Conibos and Setibos.

Sippa, Sippara. See Sepharvaim.

Sipylos (sip'i-lus). [Gr. Σίπυλος.] In ancient geography, a mountain of Lydia, Asia Minor, near Smyrna.

Not far from Karabel another monument of Hittite art has been discovered. Hard by the town of Magnesia, on the lofty cliffs of Sipylos, a strange figure has been carved out of the rock. It represents a woman, with long locks of hair streaming down her shoulders, and a jewel like a lotus-flower upon the head, who sits on a throne in a deep artificial niche. Lydian historians narrate that it was the image of the daughter of Assion, who had sought death by casting herself down from a precipice; but Greek legend preferred to see in it the figure of "weeping Niobé" turned to stone. Already Homer told how Niobé, when her twelve children had been slain by the gods, "now changed to stone, broods over the woes the gods had brought there, among the rocks, in lonely mountains, even in Sipylos, where they say are the couches of the nymphs who dance on the banks of the Akheolos." But it was only after the settlement of the Greeks in Lydia that the old monument on Mount Sipylos was held to be the image of Niobé. The limestone rock out of which it was carved dripped with moisture after rain; and as the water flowed over the face of the figure, disintegrating and disfiguring the stone as it ran, the pious Greek beheld in it the Niobé of his own mythology. The figure was originally that of the great goddess of Asia Minor, known sometimes as Atergatis or Derketo, sometimes as Kybelé, sometimes by other names.

See Sayce, Hittites, p. 69.

Sirajganj (sē-rāj-gunj'), or Surajgunje. A trading center in the district of Pabna, Bengal, British India, situated on the Jamuna arm of the Brahmaputra, 152 miles northeast of Calcutta. Population (1881), 21,037.

Siraj-ud-Daula (sē-rāj'ūd-dou'li), or Surajah Dowlah (sō-rā'jū dou'li). Put to death in 1757. A nawab of Bengal, notorious for his imprisonment of 146 British prisoners in the Black Hole of Calcutta in 1756. He was defeated by Clive at Plassey in 1757. See Black Hole.

Sirang. See Ceram.

Sir Charles Grandison. A novel by Richardson, published in 1753. Sir Charles Grandison, the hero, is respectfully in love with Harriet Byron whom he marries.

He [Grandison] is, in fact, "the faultless monster whom the world never saw!" Young, rich, graceful, and accomplished, he is not only absolutely free from vice, but all his actions are governed by high religious principle. He is humanly generous and yet perfectly prudent, and his behavior toward the fair sex is marked with all that chivalrous delicacy and respect which, since the novel was written, has passed into a proverb, and to be a Sir Charles Grandison to the ladies is supposed to be a modern lady's perfect knight.

See Forsyth, Novels and Novelists of the 18th Century, p. 221.

Sir Courtly Nice, or It Cannot Be. A comedy by Cowley, produced in 1685. The title is the name of the principal character, an insignificant but self-important top. The play held the stage for nearly a century.

Sir-Daria, or Syr-Daria, or Syr-Darya (sēr-dār'yā). A river in Russian Central Asia which rises in the Thian-Shan Mountains and flows by a delta into the eastern side of the Sea of Aral about lat. 46° N.; the ancient Jaxartes or Siron. It is called in its upper course the Naryn. Length, about 1,500 miles; navigable in the lower half of its course.

Sir-Daria. A province in the governor-generalship of Turkestan, Russian Central Asia, east of the Sea of Aral, north of Bokhara, and south of Turgai and Akmolinsk. The largest city is Tashkend. The inhabitants are Kirghiz, etc. Area, 194,853 square miles. Population, 1,214,300.

Sirène (sē-rān'). La. An opera by Auber, words by Scribe, produced at Paris in 1844.

Sirens (sī'renz). In Greek mythology, two, three, or an indeterminate number of sea-nymphs who by their singing fascinated those who sailed past their island, and then destroyed them. In works of art they are represented as having the head, arms, and generally the bust of a young woman, and the wings and lower part of the body, or sometimes only the feet, of a bird. In Attic usage they are familiar as goddesses of the grave, personifying the expression of regret and lamentation for the dead.

In the classic Sirens we cannot fail to detect the wailing of the rising storm in the cordage, which is likely to end in shipwrecks. The very name of Siren is from the Greek to pipe or whistle, just as their representatives in Vedic mythology, the Ribhus, draw their name from the word to sound. . . . The Sirens are themselves winged beings rushing over the earth, seeking everywhere the lost Persephone. Baring-Gould, Curious Myths, etc., 2d ser., p. 164.

Sir Fopling Flutter. See Man of Mode.
Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight. An Early English romance taken from the French "Roman de Perceval." It was written about 1360.

Sir Harry Wildair. A comedy by George Farquhar, printed in 1701: a sequel to "The Constant Couple." See Wildair.

Sir Hercules Buffoon, or the Poetical Squire. A play by John Lacy, published in 1684, after Lacy's death.

Sirhind (sēr-hind'). 1. A region in northern India, southeast of Lahore and northwest of Delhi, comprising part of the Panjab and several protected native states (Patiala, etc.). It lies between the Sutlej and the Jumna.—2. A small town in the state of Patiala, India, 147 miles north-northwest of Delhi.

Siricius (sī-rish'ius). Bishop of Rome from 384 or 385 to 398.

Siris (sī'ris). [Gr. Σίρις.] In ancient geography, a small river which flows into the Gulf of Tarentum in the modern province of Potenza; the modern Sinno. Near it Pyrrhus defeated the Romans in the battle of Heraclea 280 B. C.

Siris. In ancient geography, a city of Magna Græcia, Italy, situated at or near the mouth of the river Siris, about lat. 40° 5' N.

Siris, situated on a river of the same name, midway between Sybaris and Tarentum, was, according to different authors, a Trojan, a Rhodian, or an Ionian settlement. Rauflinson, Herod., III. 502, note.

Siris. A work by Bishop Berkeley, published in 1744. It is an extraordinary series of inquiries and philosophical reflections concerning his favorite panacea, tar-water, which he distilled at Cloyne.

Sirius (sir'i-us). A very white star, the brightest in the heavens; the dog-star. It is more than half a magnitude brighter than Canopus, the next brightest; its magnitude is -1.4. It is situated in the mouth of the Dog.

Sir John Oldcastle. A play by Drayton, Monday, Hathaway, and Wilson. It was published in 1600 as "by Wm. Shakespeare," but this was withdrawn in the second issue of the same year. It was evidently written against Shakespeare's "Henry IV.," in which Sir John Oldcastle was the original name of Falstaff, and was thought to be a caricature of Sir John Oldcastle, "the good Lord Cobham." But it was not written till Shakespeare had been compelled to change the name, which he did early in 1598. See Oldcastle, Sir John.

Sir John van Olden Barneveld. A play by Massinger and Fletcher, acted Aug. 14, 1619. Barneveld had been executed on the 13th of May. See Barneveld.

Sir Launcelot Greaves, The History of. A satirical romance by Smollett, published serially in the "British Magazine" 1760-61. Sir Launcelot is a Don Quixote who undertakes to redress wrongs and reform society in England in the reign of George II.

Sir Martin Mar-all, or the Feigned Innocence. A comedy by Dryden, produced in 1667 and printed in 1668. Dryden adapted it from the Duke of Newcastle's translation of Molière's "L'Étourdi," with additions from Quinault's "L'Amour Indiscrét." The principal character, Sir Martin Mar-all, is a foolish knight always committing blunders against his own interest unless acting under the advice of his servant Warner.

Sirmium (sēr'mi-um). [Gr. Σερμιον.] In ancient geography, an important city of Lower Pannonia, situated on the Save. Its ruins are near the modern Mitrovitz in Slavonia, in lat. 44° 59' N., long. 19° 37' E.

Sirrah (sir'ri). [Ar. Sirrah-al-faras, the navel of the horse.] A not unusual name for the second-magnitude star α Andromedæ, which is also δ Pegasi. See Apharatz.

Sirsa (sēr'sā). 1. A district in the Panjab, British India, intersected by lat. 30° N., long. 74°

30' E. Area, 3,008 square miles. Population (1881), 253,275.—2. The capital of the district of Sirsa, 144 miles northwest of Delhi. Population (1891), 16,415.

Sir Thomas Wyatt, The Famous History of. A play by Webster and Dekker, printed in 1607. It appears to be an abridgment of the first part of a play called "Lady Jane."

Sir Thopas. See Rime of Sir Thopas.

Sisenna (si-sen'ä), Lucius Cornelius. Born about 119 B. C.; died 67 B. C. A Roman annalist, author of a lost work on Roman history.

Sisera (sis'e-rä). In Old Testament history, the commander-in-chief of the army of Jabin, king of Canaan (Judges iv.). He was routed by Barak, and was treacherously slain by Jael, wife of Heber the Kenite, in whose tent he had sought refuge.

Sismondi (sis-mon'di; F. pron. sēs-mōn-dē'), Jean Charles Léonard (de Simonde) de. Born at Geneva, May 9, 1773; died there, June 25, 1842. A noted Swiss historian and economist. He lived in early life in Geneva, England, and Italy, and after 1800 chiefly at Geneva. His works include "Histoire des républiques italiennes" ("History of the Italian Republics," 1807-18), "De la littérature du midi de l'Europe" ("On the Literature of the South of Europe," 1813-29), "Histoire des Français" ("History of the French," 1821-1842), the historical novel "Julia Severa" (1829), "Histoire de la renaissance de la liberté en Italie" (1832), "Histoire de la chute de l'empire romain, etc." (1835), "De la richesse commerciale" (1830), "Etudes des sciences sociales" (1836-1838), etc. His correspondence was edited by Saint-René Taillandier, Montgolfier, Villari, and Monod. About 1801 he observed that his family arms were identical with those of the Italian house of the Sismondi, and assumed the connection.

Sistan (sēs-tän'), or Seistan (sā-ēs-tän'). A region in eastern Persia and southwestern Afghanistan, lying near the lower Helmand and the Hamun. By British arbitration in 1872 it was divided into Sistan proper (chiefly west of the Helmand), which was adjudged to Persia, and outer Sistan (lying east and southeast of Sistan proper), which was awarded to Afghanistan. Population of Sistan proper, estimated, 45,000.

Sisteron (sēs-t-rōn'). A town in the department of Basses-Alpes, France, at the junction of the Buech and the Durance, 25 miles south by west of Gap. It has a citadel, and a noted church. Population (1891), commune, 3,996.

Sisters (sis'tērz), The. A comedy by Shirley, licensed in April, 1652. It was one of the last productions of the pre-Restoration drama.

Sisters, The, G. Die Schwestern. A historical novel by Ebers, published in 1880. The scene was laid in Egypt 164 B. C.

Sistine (sis'tin), or Sixtine (siks'tin), Chapel. The papal private chapel in the Vatican, constructed by Pope Sixtus IV. (whence the name). It was built 1473, and is in plan a rectangle 157½ by 62½ feet, and 59 feet high. Architecturally it is insignificant; but it is world-famous for the paintings which cover its walls and vault, including works by Perugino, Botticelli, Luca Signorelli, Ghirlandajo, and above all the pictures by Michelangelo of the Creation, the Deluge, and the Last Judgment. The singing of the papal choir of the chapel has long been celebrated, and its archives contain a remarkable collection of illuminated manuscript works of the composers of the 15th and 16th centuries. The first catalogue of these was published in 1883 by Dr. Haberl at Leipsic.

Sistine Madonna. See Madonna.

Slavophiles (slāv'ō-filz), The. A Russian literary school, the principal representatives of which in the first half of the 19th century were Pogodin, Shevireff, and particularly Aksakoff, Khomiakoff, and Kirievsky. They spoke with scorn of western Europe, and particularly of France, and proclaimed the superiority of Old Russia and the old Byzantine civilization, and prophesied a brilliant future for the Slav race. It was a literary movement of which the doctrines are now fallen into disuse. It should not be confounded with the doctrine of Pan-Slavism, which is political.

Slavs (slāvz). 1. A race of peoples widely spread in eastern, southeastern, and central Europe. The Slavs are divided into two sections—the southeastern and the western. The former section comprises the Russians, Ruthenians, Bulgarians, Serbo-Croatians, Bosniaks, Montenegrins, and Slovenes; the latter, the Poles, Bohemians, Moravians, Slovaks, Wends, etc.

We start with the north of Europe, with that race which at the present day occupies the east of our portion of the globe, the Slavs. It is generally known that these peoples appear for the first time in history in the first century of our era under the name of Veneti (Tacitus, Germ., 46) or Venedi (Pliny, Hist. Nat., IX, 96), and their abode at this period can be made out with tolerable certainty. On the one hand, they cannot yet have touched the north coast of the Black Sea, for this district was occupied by the Persian Sarmatæ or Sauromatæ; on the other hand, they cannot on the west have crossed either the Carpathians or the Vistula; for, as far as the river mentioned, Tacitus is acquainted with Teutonic tribes, which partially, as in the case of the Bastarnæ, extended over it as far as the modern Galicia and farther; and in the ancient Gætic or Dacian and Pannonian proper names, large numbers of which have come down to us, no one as yet has succeeded in discovering any trace of Slavonic. It, then, in the beginning of our era, the abode of the Slavs must be sought north of the Black Sea steppes, and east of the Vistula and the Carpathians, it is also probable that the same people was settled in the district mentioned as much as five centuries earlier.

Schrader, Aryan Peoples (tr. by Jevons), p. 427.

2. See the extract.

The force he (Abd-er-Rahman III.) employed to sustain the central power was a large standing army, at the head of which stood his select body-guard of Slavs, or purchased foreigners. They were originally composed chiefly of men of Slavonian nationality, but came by degrees to include Franks, Galicians, Lombards, and all sorts of people, who were brought to Spain by Greek and Venetian traders, and sold while still children to the Sultan, to be educated as Moslems. Many of them were highly cultivated men, and naturally attached to their master. They resemble in many respects the corps of Mamluks which Saladin's successors introduced into Egypt as a body-guard, and which subsequently attained such renown as sultans of Egypt and Syria.

Poole, Story of the Moors, p. 114.

Slawkenbergius (slâ-ken-bêr'ji-us). Hafen. An imaginary author, noted for the length of his nose: referred to in Sterne's "Tristram Shandy." A story professedly by him is introduced in the latter work.

Sleep and Death. A group of Greek sculpture in the royal museum at Madrid. The two youths, ivy-crowned, stand in easy attitudes, the arm of Sleep thrown around his brother's neck, while Death holds a reversed torch upon a small altar at their feet. Behind Death there is a small figure of Aphrodite with the pomegranate—a death-goddess. The work dates from about the beginning of the Roman Empire.

Sleeping Ariadne. A celebrated statue in the Vatican, Rome. The figure, richly draped in thin tunic and himation, reclines with one arm thrown over the head, which is supported on the other bent at the elbow. It is a fine antique copy of a Greek original, probably of the time of the Pergamene school. The present pedestal is a handsome antique sarcophagus with a vigorous gigantomachy in high relief.

Sleeping Beauty, The. [F. La belle aux bois dormants, G. Dornröschen.] In Perrault's fairy tales, a princess who in her fifteenth year picks her finger with a spindle, and falls into a sleep which lasts a hundred years, thus fulfilling the prediction of the fairies at her christening. All the inmates of the palace share the magic slumber, till the fairy prince arrives who wakens the princess with a kiss. This story has been often told in French and English; and Grimm has told it in German. Tennyson takes it for the subject of his poem "The Day-Dream."

He has contributed to the "Encyclopædia Britannica" and to a number of periodicals. Among his works are "Poets and Novelists" (1875), "Lives of Shelley" (1877), "Gladstone" (1879), "Sir Robert Peel" (1881), "John Bright" (1881), "Victor Hugo" (1885), "Queen Victoria" (1889), and "William I. and the German Empire" (1889).

Smith, Gerrit. Born at Utica, N. Y., March 6, 1797; died at New York city, Dec. 28, 1874. An American philanthropist. He was connected with the Colonization Society, and later with the Antislavery Society, and gave pecuniary assistance to John Brown, in whose affair at Harper's Ferry he was not, however, implicated. He was an abolitionist member of Congress from New York 1853-54. Among his publications are "Sermons and Speeches" (1861) and "Nature the Base of a Free Theology" (1867).

Smith, Goldwin. Born at Reading, England, Aug. 13, 1823. An English historian and publicist. He graduated at Oxford in 1845; was regius professor of modern history at that university 1858-64; and was professor of English and constitutional history at Cornell University (Ithaca, New York) from 1868 to 1871, when he exchanged his chair for that of a non-resident professor and removed to Toronto. He became a member of the senate of the Toronto University; was editor of the "Canadian Monthly" 1872-74; and founded the "Toronto Week" in 1884. He has published "Lectures on Modern History" (1861), "Irish History and Irish Character" (1861), "Rational Religion" (1861), "On Church Endowments" (1862), "The Empire" (1863), "Civil War in America" (1866), "Three English Statesmen" (1867), "Reorganization of the University of Oxford" (1868), "Relations between America and England" (1869), "Short History of England" (1869), "Conduct of England to Ireland" (1882), a "History of the United States" (1893), etc.

Smith, Green Clay. Born 1832; died June 29, 1895. An American politician, general, and clergyman. He was a Federal general in the Civil War; Union member of Congress from Kentucky 1863-66; governor of Montana Territory 1890-93; and later a Baptist minister. Prohibition candidate for the presidency 1876.

Smith, Gustavus Woodson. Born in Scott County, Ky., Jan. 1, 1822; died June 23, 1896. An American soldier. He graduated at West Point in 1842; served in the Mexican war; and resigned from the army in 1854. He was street commissioner of New York city from 1858 to 1861, when, at the outbreak of the Civil War, he entered the Confederate army, and was appointed major-general in Sept., 1861. He was insurance commissioner of Kentucky 1870-76. He published "Notes on Life Insurance" (3d ed. 1877) and "Confederate War Papers" (1884).

Smith, Henry Boynton. Born at Portland, Maine, Nov. 21, 1815; died at New York city, Feb. 7, 1877. An American clergyman and scholar. He became professor of philosophy at Amherst College in 1847, and professor of church history at Union Theological Seminary in 1850 (and later of systematic theology). He resigned in 1874. He was editor of the "American Theological Review," "Presbyterian Review," and "Princeton Review." His works include "Relations of Faith and Philosophy" (1849), "History of the Church of Christ in Chronological Tables" (1859), "Church History" (1851), "The Idea of Christian Theology as a System" (1877), with R. D. Hitchcock a life of Edward Robinson (1894), etc.

Smith, Horace. Born at London, Dec. 31, 1779; died at Tunbridge Wells, July 12, 1849. An English poet, novelist, and miscellaneous writer: brother of James Smith, and associated with him in the "Rejected Addresses." He wrote "Brambletye House" (1826) and many other novels.

Smith, James. Born at London, Feb. 10, 1775; died there, Dec. 26, 1839. An English poet, noted for a collection of parodies entitled "Rejected Addresses" (in collaboration with Horace Smith in 1812). He aided Charles Mathews in "Country Cousins," etc.

Smith, John. Born at Willoughby, Lincolnshire, in Jan., 1579; died at London, June 21, 1631. An English adventurer, president of the colony of Virginia 1608-09. He was the eldest son of George Smith, a tenant farmer. Little is known of his life, except through his own writings, which are largely eulogistic of himself and of questionable authority. He studied at the free schools of Alford and Louth, and at the age of fifteen was apprenticed to a trade, but ran away and served under Lord Willoughby in the Netherlands and elsewhere. He afterward served in Hungary and Transylvania against the Turks, and was captured and sent into slavery, but escaped to Russia and ultimately returned to England, probably about 1605. He accompanied the expedition, consisting of three vessels and 105 men, which left London Dec. 19, 1606, under the command of Christopher Newport, for the purpose of establishing a colony in Virginia. He professed to have been kept under arrest during part of the voyage, on suspicion of aiming to usurp the government and make himself king. The colonists sighted the Virginia coast (Cape Henry) April 26, 1607. The same day they opened the sealed orders which they carried with them providing for the local government of the colony. The orders named a council of seven members, including John Smith (although for the present he was not allowed to take his seat), which was to elect an annual president, and which ultimately chose Edward Maria Wingfield. The settlement of Jamestown began May 13, 1607. Smith's energy in exploring the neighboring rivers, and his success in obtaining supplies from the Indians, soon secured for him admission to his place on the council. While on a voyage of exploration up the James in 1607 he was captured by the Indians and brought before Powhatan, who after a six weeks' captivity sent him back to Jamestown (see Pocahontas). When he returned to Jamestown, he found the colonists reduced to 40 men; but they were presently reinforced by the arrival of Captain Nelson with 140 immigrants. Smith explored the coasts of the Chesapeake as far as the mouth of the Patuxent June-July, and the head of the Chesapeake July-Sept., 1608. On Sept. 10, 1608, he was elected president. Captain Newport returned from a visit to England with 70 colonists. Insubordination and Indian uprisings were overcome by Smith's tact and energy, but false accounts of his administration were sent home by his enemies. A new charter was obtained by the proprietors in England (the London Company); Lord Delaware was made governor; and three commissioners were empowered to manage the affairs of the colony until the arrival of the governor. The commissioners sailed in 1609 with over 500 emigrants in nine ships, one of which, the Sea Venture, was shipwrecked off the Bermudas. The warrant of the new commission was lost in the shipwreck, with the result that Smith retained his presidency and enforced his authority over the new-comers, who were composed largely of the riffraff of London. While on an exploring expedition he was severely wounded by the explosion of his powder-bag, and returned to London in the autumn of 1609. He subsequently (in 1614) conducted an expedition fitted out by some London merchants to the coast of New England, which he explored from Penobscot to Cape Cod. In 1615 he started on a similar voyage, but was captured by the French. He escaped the same year, and the remainder of his life was spent in vain endeavors to procure financial support for the establishment of a colony in New England. He obtained the promise of 20 ships in 1617, and received the title of Admiral of New England, which he bore until his death. The expedition, however, never sailed. He wrote "A True Relation" (1608), "A Map of Virginia" (1612), "A Description of New England" (1616), "New England's Trials" (1620), "The Generall Historie of Virginia, New England, and the Summer Isles" (1624), "An Accidence for Young Seamen" (1626), "The True Travels" (1630), and "Advertisements for the Inexperienced Planters of New England" (1631).

Smith, John Cotton. Born at Sharon, Conn., Feb. 12, 1765; died there, Dec. 7, 1843. An American politician. He was Federalist member of Congress from Connecticut 1801-07, and governor of Connecticut 1813-18. He was president of the American Bible Society and of the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions.

Smith, John Cotton. Born at Andover, Mass., Aug. 4, 1826; died at New York, Aug. 10, 1882. An American Protestant Episcopal clergyman. He became rector of the Church of the Ascension, New York city, in 1860, and was a leader in tenement-house reform. He wrote "Miscellanies, Old and New" (1876), "The Liturgy as a Basis of Union," etc.

Smith, John Pye. Born at Sheffield, England, May 25, 1774; died at Guildford, England, Feb. 5, 1851. An English Independent clergyman. He wrote "Scripture Testimony to the Messiah" (1818-21), "Scripture and Geology" (1839), etc.

Smith, Joseph. Born at Sharon, Vt., Dec. 23, 1805; killed at Carthage, Ill., June 27, 1844. A Mormon prophet. He removed with his parents, poor farmers, to the State of New York about 1815, and resided successively at Palmyra and Manchester. About 1820 he began, as he claimed, to have supernatural visions, and Sept. 22, 1827, received from an angel a book written in strange hieroglyphics on golden plates, which he subsequently translated with the aid of Urim and Thummim, a pair of magic spectacles. The translation, which was dictated by Smith from behind a curtain, was published in 1830 under the title of the "Book of Mormon" (which see), on the basis of which the Mormon Church was organized in the same year. In Feb., 1831, he removed with his followers from New York State to Kirtland, Ohio, settling afterward in Missouri. In 1840 he founded the city of Nauvoo, Illinois. The revelation which he professed to have received July 12, 1843, authorizing polygamy, stirred up violent opposition among his followers, which found expression in the "Nauvoo Expositor," a newspaper founded especially for this purpose. Smith's adherents destroyed the press, and a warrant was procured for his arrest. He resisted; the militia was called out to assist the constable in serving the instrument; and he was ultimately lodged in the jail at Carthage with his brother Hyrum, where they were shot to death by a mob.

Smith, Joshua Toulmin. Born at Birmingham, England, May 29, 1816; died April 28, 1869. An English antiquary. His works include "Northmen in New England" (1839), "History of English Guilds" (1870), etc.

Smith, Kirby. See Smith, Edmund Kirby.

Smith, Marcus. Born at New Orleans, Jan. 27, 1829; died at Paris, Aug. 11, 1884. An American actor, known as Mark Smith: son of Solomon F. Smith. He played many Shaksperian parts, and had great versatility, ranging easily from Sir Peter Teazle and Sir William Foulstone to Digory and Powhatan (in Brongham's burlesque "Pocahontas").

Smith, Melancton or Melancthon. Born at New York, May 24, 1810; died at Green Bay, Wis., July 19, 1893. An American admiral. He was appointed midshipman in the United States navy in 1826; was promoted commander in 1855, captain in 1862, commodore in 1866, and rear-admiral in 1870. He served in the Civil War before New Orleans, at Fort Hudson, Fort Fisher, etc. He was commandant of the Brooklyn navy-yard 1870-72, and was afterward governor of the Naval Asylum at Philadelphia.

Smith, Morgan Lewis. Born in Oswego County, N. Y., March 8, 1822; died at Jersey City, N. J., Dec. 29, 1874. An American general, brigade and division commander under Grant and Sherman in the West during the Civil War.

Smith, Philip. Died 1885. An English historian, brother of Sir William Smith (1813-93). He was head-master of the Mill Hill Protestant Dissenters' School, Hendon, and was a coadjutor of his brother in the compilation of the dictionaries of Greek and Roman antiquities, biography, and geography. He published "A History of the World" (1864 et seq.).

Smith, Robert. Born 1689; died at Cambridge, 1768. An English mathematician. He was appointed Plumian professor of astronomy at Cambridge in 1716, and master of Trinity College in 1742. He is chiefly known as the founder of Smith's prizes (which see) at Cambridge. He wrote "Complete System of Optics" (1738), etc.

Smith, Robert. Born Nov., 1757; died at Baltimore, Nov. 26, 1842. An American politician, brother of Samuel Smith (1752-1839). He was secretary of the navy 1801-05; attorney-general 1805; and secretary of state 1809-11.

Smith, Robert Payne. Born Nov., 1818; died April 1, 1895. An English Orientalist and theologian. He was regius professor of divinity at Oxford from 1865 to 1871, when he became dean of Canterbury. He was a member of the Old Testament Revision Company. He published "The Authenticity and Messianic Interpretation of the Prophecies of Isaiah Vindicated" (1862), "Prophecy: a Preparation for Christ" (1869), "Thesaurus Syriacus" (1868 et seq.), etc.

Smith, Roswell. Born at Lebanon, Conn., March 30, 1829; died at New York, April 19, 1892. An American publisher, a founder, with Dr. J. G. Holland and Charles Scribner & Co., of "Scribner's Monthly," later (1881) the "Century" magazine. He was the founder and president of The Century Co. (New York city).

Smith, Samuel Francis. Born at Boston, Oct. 21, 1808; died Nov. 16, 1895. An American Baptist clergyman and poet. He is well known from his hymns and songs, including "My Country, 'Tis of Thee" (1832), "The Morning Light is Breaking" (1832), etc.

Smith, Seba. Born at Buekfield, Maine, Sept. 14, 1792; died at Patchogue, L. I., July 29, 1868. An American journalist and miscellaneous writer. He published "Life and Letters of Major Jack Downing" (1833), "Way Down East, etc." (1855), "My Thirty Years Out of the Senate, by Major Jack Downing" (1859-1860), etc.

Smith, Sydney. Born at Woodford, Essex, England, June 3, 1771; died at London, Feb. 22, 1845. An English clergyman, wit, and essayist. He was educated at Winchester and at New College, Oxford; took orders; and was curate of Netheravon on Salisbury Plain. He lived in Edinburgh from 1798 to 1803, and then went to London. While in Edinburgh he was one of the founders of the "Edinburgh Review," its first editor (1802), and one of its chief contributors for twenty years. From 1804 to 1808 he was one of the lecturers on moral philosophy at the Royal Institution, London, teaching the principles of Dugald Stewart. These lectures were published in 1850. In 1809 he was presented to the living of Foston-le-Clay, Yorkshire, where there had been no clergyman for over 100 years; he lived there for twenty years as a village priest. In 1828 he was presented to a prebend of Bristol, and in 1829 to the living of Combe-Florey in Somerset; and in 1831 he was canon residentiary of St. Paul's. He was noted as a brilliant critic, and as a talker and a wit. Macaulay calls him "the greatest master of ridicule that has appeared among us since Swift." His chief works are "Letters on the Subject of the Catholics, by Peter Plymley" (1807-08; advocating Catholic emancipation and Parliamentary reform); sixty-five articles from the "Edinburgh Review," republished in 1839; "Wit and Wisdom" (edited by Duyckinck, 1856); and a number of volumes of speeches, sermons, and letters on questions of the day. His life was published by his daughter, Lady Holland (1855; including his letters).

Smith, Walter Chalmers. Born at Aberdeen in 1824. A Scottish clergyman and poet. He was educated at Aberdeen and Edinburgh, and has held pastoral charges in the Free Church of Scotland at Orwell, Glasgow, and Edinburgh. He is distinguished as a preacher and for his practical interest in public affairs. His poems include "The Bishop's Walk" (1861), "Ohrig Grange" (1872), "Hilda among the Broken Gods" (1878), "Kildrostan" (1884), etc.

Smith, Wayland. See Wayland.

Smith, William. Born at New York, June 25, 1728; died at Quebec, Canada, Nov. 3, 1793. An American jurist and historian. He graduated from Yale in 1745, studied law, and became chief justice of the province of New York in 1763, and a member of the council in 1767. He finally attached himself, after much wavering, to the cause of the British, and became chief justice of Canada in 1786. He wrote "History of the Province of New York, etc." (1757).

Smith, William. Born at Churehill, Oxfordshire, England, March 23, 1769; died at Northampton, England, Aug. 28, 1839. An English geologist, called "the Father of English Geology." He began as a mineral surveyor and civil engineer, and in 1794 was appointed engineer of the Somerset Coal Canal. He published "Geological Map of England and Wales with Part of Scotland" (1815), geological county maps, and works on the connection of strata with organic remains.

Smith, Sir William. Born at London in 1812 or 1813; died Oct. 7, 1893. An English classical and biblical scholar. He studied at University College (London), and kept terms at Gray's Inn, but abandoned law in order to devote himself to the study of classical literature. He was editor of the "Quarterly Review" from 1867 until his death, and was knighted in 1892. He edited a "Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities" (1842), "Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography and Mythology" (3 vols., late ed. 1880), "Dictionary of Greek and Roman Geography" (2 vols. 1854-57), "Dictionary of the Bible" (1860-63), Latin-English dictionary (1855); was joint editor of "Dictionary of Christian Antiquities" (1875-80), and "Dictionary of Christian Biography" (4 vols. 1877-87); and wrote or edited various classical text-books, historical manuals, etc.

Smith, William Farrar. Born Feb. 17, 1824; died Feb. 28, 1903. An American (Union) general and engineer. He graduated at West Point in 1845; was a division commander in the Peninsular campaign and at Antietam; and was a corps commander at Fredericksburg. He was chief engineer of the Department of the Cumberland and of the Division of the Mississippi. He took an important part in the operations near Chattanooga, 1863. In 1864 he was confirmed major-general of volunteers, and was corps commander at Cold Harbor and before Petersburg in the same year.

Smith, William Henry. Born at London, June 24, 1825; died at Walmer Castle, Oct. 6, 1891. An English Conservative politician and publisher. He was financial secretary to the treasury 1874-1877; first lord of the admiralty 1877-80; secretary for war 1885-86 and 1886-87; and first lord of the treasury and leader of the House of Commons from 1887 until his death.

Smith, William Robertson. Born at Keig, Aberdeenshire, Nov. 8, 1846; died at Cambridge, England, March 31, 1894. A distinguished Scottish biblical scholar and Orientalist. He was the eldest son of a scholarly clergyman, who was his sole teacher till he entered Aberdeen University. After gaining exceptional distinction there, he went to the Free Church College at Edinburgh, and afterward studied at the universities of Bonn and Göttingen. In 1870 he was appointed Hebrew professor in the Free Church College at Aberdeen. A keen ecclesiastical controversy arose out of certain of his writings—the question at issue being the extent of liberty in matters of biblical criticism and interpretation permissible in an evangelical church. His contributions to the "Encyclopædia Britannica," especially the article "Bible," published in 1876, led to a series of attempts to convict him of heresy. These were unsuccessful, largely owing to the attraction of a powerful personal influence, as well as to his skillful conduct of his defense; but in 1881 he was removed from his chair without being deprived of its emoluments, of which, however, he declined to continue acceptance. The ground assigned by the Assembly for this action was that "he no longer considered it safe or advantageous to teach in one of her colleges." From 1881 he was associated as joint editor of the "Encyclopædia Britannica" with T. Spencer Baynes, after whose death in 1887 he was sole editor. He was lord almoner's reader in Arabic at Cambridge University 1883-86, librarian of the University 1886-89, and professor of Arabic 1889-94. He published "The Old Testament in the Jewish Church" (1881), "The Prophets of Israel, and their Place in History" (1882), "Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia" (1885), "The Religion of the Semites" (1889), etc.

Smith, Sir William Sidney: often called Sir Sidney Smith. Born at Westminster, July 21, 1764; died at Paris, May 26, 1840. An English admiral. Entering the navy at 11, he won a lieutenantcy in the battle off Cape St. Vincent, Jan., 1793. In 1788-90 he advised the King of Sweden in his war with Russia; in 1793 he joined Lord Hood at Toulon; and on April 19, 1796, he was captured in the harbor of Havre-de-Grâce, and sent to Paris. He escaped in 1798, and crossed the Channel in a skiff. In Oct., 1798, he was sent to Constantinople as plenipotentiary; but, learning of Bonaparte's operations at St. Jean d'Acre, went to its relief. On March 16, 1799, he captured the French flotilla, and on May 20 compelled Bonaparte to raise the siege. He served as brigadier-general under Abercromby at the battle of Abukir. In 1802 he was member of Parliament for Rochester; in 1805 was sent on secret service to Sicily and Naples; in 1807 joined Sir John Duckworth against the Turks; and on Feb. 7 destroyed the Turkish fleet at Abydos.

Smith College. An institution for the higher education of women, situated at Northampton, Massachusetts. It was founded by Sophia Smith (1796-1870), and opened in 1875. It has about 1,100 students.

Smithfield (smith'fēld). A locality in London, north of St. Paul's. It was formerly a recreation-ground, and was long famous for its cattle-market. It was noted in the time of Queen Mary as the place for burning heretics at the stake.

Smith's Island (smiths i'land). A small island off the coast of North Carolina, to which it belongs, 24 miles south of Wilmington. It contains Cape Fear.

Smithson (smith'son), James (James Lewis Macie). Born in France, about 1765; died at Genoa, June 27, 1829. An English scientist, illegitimate son of the first Duke of Northumberland. He made a bequest to the United States for the establishment of a scientific institution. See Smithsonian Institution.

Smithsonian Institution. An institution of learning at Washington, established in 1846, for the "increase and diffusion of knowledge among men." It was founded by James Smithson, an English chemist and mineralogist, and a fellow of the Royal Society. At his death, in 1829, he bequeathed £105,000 to the government of the United States in trust "to found at Washington an establishment, under the name of the Smithsonian Institution, for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men," which bequest became operative in 1835. In 1838 the United States government received from the Court of Chancery of Great Britain $515,169, which sum was increased by careful financial management to $703,000. This amount was further increased in 1891 by a gift from Mr. Thomas George Hodgkins of Setauket, New York, of $200,000—a portion of the income of which was to be devoted to "the increase and diffusion of more exact knowledge in regard to the nature and properties of the atmospheric air, in connection with the welfare of man." Mr. Hodgkins also named the Institution as his residuary legatee. The funds of the Institution are deposited in the United States Treasury, the government paying 6 per cent. interest on the fund. After the discussion of numerous plans, Congress passed an act in 1846 creating an "establishment" consisting of the President and members of the cabinet and a board of regents (the Vice-President, 3 senators, 3 members of the House of Representatives, and six other citizens), the executive officer to be a secretary elected by the board of regents. The Institution has devoted itself to the two lines of work marked out in the terms of the bequest—the prosecution of original research, and the publication and distribution of memoirs on subjects relating to science. During the course of its existence, it has originated many scientific undertakings of great importance, which have since been taken up by the government, and for which separate bureaus have been established, some independent of the Institution, others under its direction. Out of its meteorological service the United States Weather Bureau has grown; in connection with its work in ichthyology the United States Fish Commission was established. Under the direction of the Smithsonian Institution are the United States National Museum, the legal custodian of all government collections; the Bureau of International Exchanges; the Bureau of American Ethnology; the Astro-Physical Observatory; and the National Zoological Park. The Institution has a library of 150,000 volumes (especially rich in transactions of learned societies) and scientific journals. This library was deposited in 1866, by act of Congress, with the library of Congress, only a working library being retained by the Institution. The Institution, however, enjoys the customary use of its library as well as a free use of the library of Congress. The Institution has had three secretaries—Joseph Henry, a physicist (1846-78); Spencer Fullerton Baird, a zoologist (1878-87); and Samuel Pierpont Langley, an astronomer and physicist (1887-). Its publications consist of "Contributions to Knowledge" (quarto, vols. 1-25); "Miscellaneous Collections" (vols. 1-36); and Reports (1846-92). Reports of the National Museum 1884-1924, Bulletin of the National Museum (1-60), Proceedings of the National Museum (1-16), Annual Reports of the Bureau of Ethnology (vols. 1-13). It has a building, used for offices and exhibition halls. It has taken part in all the scientific expeditions and explorations conducted by the government, and in all international exhibitions. In 1903 it offered prizes of $10,000, $2,000, and $1,000 in connection with the Hodgkins bequest.

Smith Sound. A sea passage in the arctic regions, leading northward from Baffin Bay, and separating Prudhoe Land (in Greenland) on the east from Ellesmere Land on the west.

Smith's Prizes. Two prizes at the University of Cambridge, founded by Robert Smith (1689-1768). From 1769 to 1822 they were awarded to the students proceeding B. A. who were most successful in a special examination in mathematics. From 1823 they have been awarded to writers of the best essays on any subject in mathematics or natural philosophy.

Smoky (smō'ki) City, The. A name frequently given to Pittsburg.

Smolensk (smō-lensk'). 1. A government of western central Russia, surrounded by the governments of Pskoff, Tver, Moscow, Kaluga, Tchernigoff, Moghileff, and Vitebsk. The chief occupation is agriculture. Area, 21,638 square miles. Population (1891), 1,412,162.—2. A cathedral city, the capital of the government of Smolensk, situated on the Dnieper about lat. 54° 48' N. It is an important strategic point, and is one of the oldest cities of Russia. It was annexed to Lithuania in 1494; conquered and annexed by Russia in 1514; taken by Sigismund III. of Poland in 1611; retaken by the Russians in 1654; and in 1667 definitely reannexed by Russia. A victory was gained there by the French army under Napoleon over the Russians under Barclay de Tolly and Bagnration, Aug. 17, 1812 (N. S.), when the town was partly burned. Population (1899), 37,741.

Smolensk, Principality of. A medieval principality of central Russia, acquired by Lithuania about 1400.

Smolkin (smol'kin). A fiend mentioned in Shakspeare's "King Lear."

Smollett (smol'et), Tobias George. Born at Dalquhurn, Dumbartonshire, Scotland, March, 1721; died at Monte Novo, near Leghorn, Italy, Oct. 21, 1771. A British novelist, historical writer, and miscellaneous author. He was educated at the grammar-school of Dumbarton and the university of Glasgow, and was apprenticed to a surgeon. About 1740 he went to London and entered the navy as a surgeon, and in 1741 was present at the siege of Cartagena. In 1744 he returned to England, and until 1767 lived there and on the Continent, devoting himself to literary work, and editing "The Critical Review" and "The Briton." In 1767 he retired with broken health to Monte Novo, where he died. Among his works are the novels "The Adventures of Roderick Random" (1748), "The Adventures of Peregrine Pickle" (1751), "The Adventures of Ferdinand, Count Fathom" (1753), "The Adventures of Sir Lancelot Greaves" (1760-61), and "The Expedition of Humphrey Clinker" (1771); and among his other works are "A Complete History of England" (1757-65), "The Reprisals, or the Tars of Old England" (1757; a farce), "The History and Adventures of an Atom" (1769; a satire), "Travels" (1766), and translations of "Don Quixote" (1755) and "Gil Blas" (1761); a later translation by Mr. Benjamin Heath Malkin has been printed with Smollett's name.

Smyrna (smēr'nā), Turk. Izmīr (iz-mēr'). A seaport in the vilayet of Aidin, Asia Minor, Turkey, situated on the Gulf of Smyrna in lat. 38° 26' N., long. 27° 9' E. It is the most important city of Asia Minor, and the chief commercial center in the Levant. Its exports include cotton, figs, raisins, carpets, opium, etc. It consists of a Turkish and a Frank quarter, and is the terminus of two railway lines. It was an ancient Eolian settlement, and later was colonized from the Ionian city Colophon, and became a member of the Ionian League (688 B. C.). It claimed to be the birthplace of Homer. It was conquered by the Lydian king Alyattes, and was rebuilt and enlarged by Antigonus and Lysimachus, and became one of the chief cities of Asia. It was one of the seven cities addressed by John in the Revelation. It was destroyed by an earthquake 178 A. D., and was restored by Marcus Aurelius; was occupied by the Knights of St. John in the 14th century; and was sacked by Timur in 1402. From 1424 it has been under Turkish rule. Population, 200,000 (Greeks, Turks, Armenians, and Franks).

Social War, or Marsic War. A war (90-88 B. C.) between Rome and the greater part of her Italian allies in central and southern Italy, including the Marsi, Peligni, Samnites, and Lucanians. It was caused by the refusal on the part of the Romans to extend the privileges of Roman citizenship. The Italians formed a new republic with its capital at Corfinium. The chief Roman commanders were Marius and Sulla. Rome made many concessions and suppressed the rebellion.

Social Wars. In Greek history: (a) A war (357 (358 ?)-355 B. C.) in which Athens was defeated by her former allies Byzantium, Chios, Cos, and Rhodes. (b) A war between the Achaean and Aetolian leagues (220-217 B. C.).

Society and Solitude. A collection of essays by Ralph Waldo Emerson, published in 1870.

Society (sō-sī'e-ti) Islands, or Tahiti (tä-hē'tē) Archipelago. [F. Archipel de Taïti, or Archipel de la Société.] A large group of islands in the South Pacific Ocean, about lat. 16°-18° S., long. 148°-155° W. It comprises two subgroups, the Leeward and the Windward. The chief islands are Tahiti, Raiatea, Borabora, Meitia, and Eimeo. They export coconuts, oranges, cotton, mother-of-pearl, etc. The capital is Papeete. The inhabitants are natives (nominally Christianized), French, and others. The islands were visited (probably) by the Spanish navigator Pedro Fernandez de Quiros in 1607, and in the 18th century by Bougainville, Cook, the mutineers of the Bounty, and others. They were taken under French protection in 1842 by Du Petit-Thouars, and Tahiti, Eimeo, and other islands were made a French colony in 1880. Area, 660 square miles. Population of Tahiti, 9,600.

Society of Friends. The proper designation of a Christian sect commonly called Quakers, which took its rise in England about the middle of the 17th century through the preaching of George Fox. A division occurred in portions of the Society in America in 1827, through the preaching of Elias Hicks, whose followers, commonly called Hicksites, hold doctrinal views closely approximating those of the Unitarians, while in church government and other respects they retain the usages of the orthodox Friends. The latter agree doctrinally with other evangelical Christians, but lay greater stress on the doctrine of the personal presence and guidance of the Holy Spirit. They have no paid minister, and accept the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's Supper in a spiritual sense only, rejecting their outward observance as church rites. They condemn all oath-taking and all war. The organization of the society involves four periodical gatherings called "meetings": namely, preparative meeting, monthly meeting, quarterly meeting, and yearly meeting. The body called the Yearly Meeting has legislative power. There are two Yearly Meetings in Great Britain, one in Canada, and ten in the United States.

Socinians (sō-sin'i-anz). Those who hold to the doctrines of the Italian theologians Lælius Socinus (1525-62) and Faustus Socinus (1539-1604) and their followers. The term Socinianism is in theological usage a general one, and includes a considerable variety of opinion. The Socinians believe that Christ was a man miraculously conceived and divinely endowed, and therefore entitled to honor and reverence, but not to divine worship; that the object of his death was to perfect and complete his example and to prepare the way for his resurrection, the necessary historical basis of Christianity; that baptism is a declarative rite merely, and the Lord's Supper merely commemorative; that divine grace is general and exerted through the means of grace, not special and personally efficacious; that the Holy Spirit is not a distinct person, but the divine energy; that the authority of Scripture is subordinate to that of the reason; that the soul is pure by nature, though contaminated by evil example and teaching from a very early age; and that salvation consists in accepting Christ's teaching and following his example. The Socinians thus occupy theologically a position midway between the Arians, who maintain the divinity of Jesus Christ, but deny that he is coequal with the Father, and the Humanitarians, who deny his supernatural character altogether.

Socinus (sō-si'nus), Faustus, Latinized from Fausto Sozzini. Born at Siena, Italy, 1539: died near Craeow, March, 1604. An Italian Unitarian theologian, nephew of Lælius Socinus. He lived in Italy and Basel; visited Transylvania 1578-79; and resided in Poland after 1579. Among his works are "De Jesu Christo Servatore," "De antichritate S. Scripturae."

Socinus, Lælius, Latinized from Lelio Sozzini (or Sozini or Soccini). Born at Siena, Italy, 1525: died at Zurich, 1562. An Italian Protestant thinker, an antitrinitarian. See Socinians.

Soconusco (sō-kō-nōs'kō). A department which forms the southern part of the state of Chiapas, Mexico, bordering on the Pacific. It was conquered by Alvarado in 1524, and formed a part of Guatemala until 1825. The aboriginal inhabitants (Soconuscans) were perhaps of Chiapanec stock, but had submitted to the Aztecs before the Spanish conquest. The region is said to have been very populous.

Socotra (sō-kō'trā or sok'o-trā), or Socotora (sok'ō-tō-rā), or Sokotra (sō-kō'trā or sok'ō-trā). An island in the Indian Ocean, east of Cape Guardafui and south of Arabia, in lat. (of Tamarida) 12° 39' N., long. 53° 59' E.: the ancient Dioscorides. The surface is generally mountainous; the chief products are aloes and dragon's-blood. Its principal place is Tamarida. The inhabitants were formerly Nestorian Christians. Socotra was occupied by the Portuguese in the 16th century, and was annexed by Great Britain in 1886. Length, 71 miles. Area, 1,382 square miles. Population, 10,000.

Socrates (sok'ra-téz). [Gr. Σωκράτης.] Born at Athens about 470 B. C.: died there, 399. A famous Greek philosopher. He was the son of Sophroniscus, a sculptor, and of Phænarete, a midwife. He at first adopted his father's art: in the time of Pausanias a group of draped Graces, by him, still stood on the approach to the Acropolis. He soon, however, devoted himself entirely to the pursuit of philosophy, and became famous through the persistency and skill with which, in conversation with the sophists and with every one who would yield himself to the dialogue, he conducted the analysis of philosophical and ethical ideas ("the Socratic method"). He was above all a searcher after a knowledge of virtue (which indeed he identified with knowledge), and was in himself the noblest exponent of the ethical life of the Greeks. He served at Potidea (431), Delium (424), and Amphipolis (422); was president of the prytaes in 406; and opposed the Thirty Tyrants. He is the chief character in the dialogues of Plato, in which his teachings are set forth (greatly modified by Plato's own views), and is the subject of the "Memorabilia" of Xenophon. His most famous pupils were Plato, Xenophon, and Alcibiades. He was bitterly attacked by Aristophanes as a sophist and innovator, and drew upon himself by his mode of life and the character of his opinions the enmity of many others. In 399 he was accused of impiety (the introduction of new gods) and of corrupting the youth; defended himself in a famous speech which enraged rather than conciliated his judges; was condemned; and drank hemlock in his prison, surrounded by his disciples.

Socrates. Born at Constantinople: died after 440 A. D. A Greek church historian. His ecclesiastical history was edited by Migne and by Hussey (1853: English translation by Hauner 1619).

Soissonais (swā-so-nā'). The region around Soissons.

Soissons (swā-sōn'). A city in the department of Aisne, France, situated on the Aisne 19 miles southwest of Laon: an important and strongly fortified strategic point. It has manufactures and trade in agricultural products. The Cathedral of Notre Dame, chiefly of the 13th century, is masked by buildings and is not very effective externally, but presents an admirable interior of excellent proportions and beautiful arcading and details. The south transept has a semicircular end and a double triforium, offering notable perspective effects. The cathedral has rich glass and a handsome chapter-house. The Abbey of St.-Jean des Vignes was almost wholly destroyed in the Revolution, except the fine west front of the church, which has 3 recessed and canopied portals, a large rose, and 2 massive flanking towers, all of the 13th century, crowned by later spires of unequal height. Soissons was probably the ancient Belgic town Noviodunum, and was the chief town of the Suesiones (whence its name). In the Roman period it was called Augusta Suesionum. It was the capital of the Frankish kingdom of Clotaire in the 6th century. It has often been besieged and taken (as in 1814 and 1815), the last time by the Germans in Oct., 1870. Solimões (sō-lē-mōi'ēs). The common Brazilian name for the middle portion of the Amazon River, from the frontier of Peru to the junction of the Rio Negro. The Solimões or Sorimões, an Indian tribe from which the name is derived, formerly occupied a portion of the banks near the junction of the Puris: they were probably of Tupi stock.

Solingen (zō'ling-en). A town in the Rhine Province, Prussia, 18 miles north-northeast of Cologne. It is noted for its manufactures of iron and steel (sword-blades, knives, scissors, files, bayonets, revolvers, etc.). Population (1890), 36,540.

Solinus (sō-lī'nus). The Duke of Ephesus, a character in Shakspeare's "Comedy of Errors."

Solinus (sō-lī'nus), Caius Julius. Lived in the 3d century A. D. A Roman grammarian, author of a geographical work drawn largely from Pliny.

The grammarian C. Julius Solinus composed his Collectanea rerum memorabilium in the first ten or twenty years of this period, if not earlier. The work is mainly a selection from the curiosities mentioned in Pliny's Natural History, arranged from the geographical point of view and greatly enlarged. Solinus did not, however, himself compose this epitome, but merely further abridged an earlier and more extensive one; for the historical matter therein a chronicle of the best period has been employed. The individual additions of the author are quite worthless, his diction is pretentious and void of taste, the style long-winded. But this work was well suited to the taste of the succeeding age. It was revised in the sixteenth century, and then received the new title of Polyhistor.

Teuffel and Schnebe, Hist. of Rom. Lit. (tr. by Warr), [1], 291.

Solis (sō-lēs'), Juan Diaz de. Born at Lebrija, Andalusia (according to some at Oviedo, Asturias, or in Portugal), about 1470; died on the bank of the Rio de la Plata, 1516. A Spanish navigator. He was associated with Vicente Yañez Pinzon in exploring the coasts of Honduras and a small part of Yucatan in 1506, and the south American coast from Cape St. Augustine to lat. 40° S. in 1508. In this voyage they entered (though they did not discover) the Bay of Rio de Janeiro, and passed the mouth of the Rio de la Plata without exploring it. Varnhagen believed that Solis was with Gonçalo Coelho on the Brazilian coast as early as 1503. In 1512 he succeeded Vespucci as chief pilot of Spain. In Oct., 1515, he sailed from Lepe, with 3 vessels, to seek a south-western route to the Pacific. Entering the Rio de la Plata, he explored it for some distance, but, having landed, was killed by the Indians. It is probable that the river had been partly explored by Portuguese navigators some years before.

Solis, River of. [Sp. Río de Solis.] A name given, in early maps and books, to the Rio de la Plata. See Solis, Juan Diaz de.

Solis y Ribadeneyra (sō-lēs'yē-rē-bā-rhā-nā'rā), Antonio de. Born at Alcalá de Henares, July 18, 1610; died at Madrid, April 19, 1686. A Spanish author. He was secretary of Philip IV., and in 1666 was appointed historiographer of the Indies. In 1667 he took orders. His earlier works include poems, collected and published at Madrid in 1602; dramas, among which are "Gitanilla," "One Fool Makes a Hundred," and "Love à la Mode"; an opera called "Triumphs of Love and Fortune"; etc. His "Historia de la Conquista de México" (1st ed. 1634) is one of the Spanish prose classics, but shows little profundity of research. There is a continuation by Ignacio Salazar y Olarte (1743).

Sollas (sol'ās), W. J. Born at Birmingham, England, May 30, 1849. An English geologist and biologist; professor of geology and mineralogy in the University of Dublin 1883-97, and professor of geology and paleontology at the University of Oxford 1897-.

Solomon (sō'lō-mōn). [F. Salomon, It. Salomone, Sp. Salomón, Pg. Salomão, G. Salomo, LL. Salomo, Gr. Σαλωμων, Heb. Shelomo, peaceable.] A famous king of Israel, 993-953 B. C. (Duncker), son of David and Bathsheba. He was the youngest son of David, but, through the influence of his mother and of Nathan, was made his heir. Under him Israel became a great power, and he himself became famous for his wealth, his luxury, and his wisdom—the last, according to the Bible account, a special gift of God. His great work was the building of the temple (which see). He was in alliance, political and commercial, with Hiram of Tyre and with other powers, and extended Israelitish commerce to all parts of the known world. The name of Solomon, who was supposed to have possessed extraordinary magical powers, plays an important part in Eastern and thence in European legends. According to one tradition, the Ethiopians are descended from him through a son which the Queen of Sheba bore him.

The Arabians attribute to Solomon a perpetual enmity and warfare against wicked genii and giants, and they have numberless tales of his wonder-working rig.

D'Herbelot, Southey's Poems.

Solomon. 1. An epic poem by Prior, published in 1718.—2. An oratorio by Handel, produced at London in 1749.

Solomon Islands or Archipelago, or Salomon (F. pron. sä-lö-mön') Islands. A group of islands in the Pacific Ocean, east of New Guinea, about lat. 5°-11° S. The chief islands of the group are Bougainville, Choiseul, Ysabel, Malanta, Guadalcanar, New Georgia, and San Christoval. They are mountainous and volcanic. Their inhabitants are principally Melanesians, and are warlike cannibals. The islands were discovered by Mendana in the 16th century. The northern part of the group, with an area of 4,200 square miles and a population of 45,000, belongs to Germany.

Solomon River. A river in northern Kansas which unites with the Smoky Hill River to form the Kansas River. Length, about 300 miles.

Solon (sō'lon). [Gr. Σόλων.] Born about 638 B. C.; died about 559. A famous Athenian lawgiver. He encouraged the Athenians to regain possession of Salamis. In 594 he became archon and was charged with various reforms. He improved the condition of the debtors, divided the population into four "classes," and reorganized the Boule, the popular assembly, and the council of the Areopagus. He traveled in Cyprus and the East.

Solon (649 B. C.), the great lawgiver, used elegy more in the manner of Callinus or Tyrtaeus. In his early manhood, his stirring verses moved the Athenians to win back Salamis from the Megarians. And when he had carried his great reforms, elegy became the voice of his calm joy.

Jebb, Greek Lit., p. 54.

Solor (sō-lör'). A small island in the Malay Archipelago, east of Flores, from which it is separated by the Strait of Flores.

Solórzano y Pereira (sō-lör'thā-nō ē pā-rā'-ē-rā), Juan de. Born at Madrid, Nov. 30, 1575; died there, 1654. A Spanish jurist and author. He was professor of law at Salamanca, a judge of the audience of Lima, Peru, 1610-27, and subsequently a councillor of the Indies. His works include "Política Indiana," and "De Indiarum Jure," relating largely to colonial affairs, and containing much information regarding the Indians.

Solothurn zō'lō-törn). [F. Soleure.] 1. A canton of Switzerland, of very irregular shape, bounded by Basel, Aargau, and Bern. Capital, Solothurn. It has 4 members in the National Council. The prevailing language is German; the religion largely Roman Catholic (over 20 per cent. Protestant). A large part of the territories of the canton was acquired by the city of Solothurn in the 15th century. It was admitted as a canton into the confederation in 1481. Area, 392 square miles. Population (1888), 85,621.

2. The capital of the canton of Solothurn, situated on the Aare in lat. 47° 13' N., long. 7° 32' E.; the Roman Solodurum. It became a free imperial city in 1218, and was allied with Bern in 1295. It has a cathedral. Population (1890), 8,460.

Soltikoff, Count Peter. Born about 1700; died Dec. 15, 1772. A Russian field-marshal. He commanded the Russian contingent in the victory of Kunersdorf in 1759.

Solus (sō'lus), or Soluntum (sō-lun'tum). In ancient geography, a city on the northern coast of Sicily, 12 miles southeast of Palermo. It was an ancient Phœnician colony.

Solway Firth (sol'wā fērth). An arm of the Irish Sea, lying between the counties of Kirkcubright and Dumfries in Scotland on the north, and Cumberland in England on the southeast; noted for the rapidity of its tides. The estuary of the Esk forms its upper part. Length, 36 miles. Greatest width, 22 miles.

Solway Moss. A district in Cumberland, England, 8 miles north by west of Carlisle, on the Scottish border. It was formerly a bog, but is now drained. It was the scene of a victory of the English over the Scots in 1542.

Solyman (sol'i-man) I. (sometimes called Solyman II.), surnamed "The Magnificent." [Turk. Ar. Suleiman, from Gr. Σολομών, Solomon.] Born about 1490; died before Sziget, Hungary, 1566. Sultan of Turkey 1520-66, son of Selim I. He raised the Turkish empire to its highest point; captured Belgrad from the Hungarians in 1521; besieged and captured Rhodes from the Knights of St. John in 1522; invaded Hungary in 1526, and totally defeated King Louis II. at Mohács; and unsuccessfully besieged Vienna in 1529. By the treaty of 1533 a part of Hungary was ceded to the Prince of Transylvania, an ally of Turkey. Solyman conquered from Persia Mosul, Bagdad, part of Armenia, etc.; received the submission of the Barbary States; and again waged war with Hungary, and annexed by the treaty of 1547 a great part of Hungary and Transylvania. His troops were repulsed in the siege of Malta in 1565. In 1566 he invaded Hungary with a vast army, and died while besieging Sziget. He was the greatest of the Ottoman sultans, and equally noted as a ruler and as a patron and encourager of the fine arts and of learning.

Solyman II. (sometimes called Solyman III.). Turkish Sultan 1657-91, brother of Mohammed IV.

Solyman, or Soliman, or Suleiman (sō-lā-mān'). Killed about 1410. Eldest son of Bajazet I., and an independent ruler in Adrianople. Soma (sō'mā). [Skt., 'extract,' from √ su, extract.] In Sanskrit, a plant and its sap, often personified as a god; also, the moon. This plant, now represented by the Sarcostemma viminale or Asclepias acida, was in Vedic times collected by moonlight on certain mountains, stripped of its numerous leaves, and then carried to the place of sacrifice, where the priests crushed the stalks between stones, sprinkled them with water, and placed them on a sieve or strainer for purification, whence the acid juice trickled into a vessel, after which it was mixed with clarified butter, barley, etc., allowed to ferment, and offered in libations to the gods, or drunk by the Brahmans. It is sometimes described as brought from the sky by a falcon and guarded by the Gandharvas, or as brought by the daughters of the Sun from a spot where it had been nourished by Parjanya, the rain-god, whom the Rigveda represents as its father. All the 114 hymns of the 9th Mandala of the Rigveda, besides many others in this Veda, and the whole Samaveda, are devoted to its praise. In some parts of India soma-sacrifices are still offered, but the use of the plant is little known, and it is questionable whether the plant now regarded as the soma is really that of the Vedas. The modern medical work of Sushruta distinguishes 24 varieties. The juice was regarded in Vedic times as a nectar conferring eternal life and vigor on its drinkers, whether gods or men, and was a favorite propitiatory offering. In its character as a god it was represented as primeval, all-powerful, all-pervading, healing all diseases, lord of all other gods. This worship of Soma has great similarity to the Dionysiac and Bacchic worship of the Greeks and Romans. The name becomes in Avestan Haoma, where it designates a plant with yellow flowers and knotty stalk, growing in Ghilan, Mazandaran, Shirvan, and Yazd, also its juice and the Genius of the plant. Haoma is often invoked in the Avesta, where the 9th Ha of the Yasna is devoted to his praises. The haoma plays a great part in the rites of the Parsis. The prominence of Soma and Haoma in the Veda and the Avesta, respectively, constitutes one of the most important indications of an original Indo-Iranian unity. The name soma came to designate the moon in post-Vedic mythology probably from the fact that the moon was regarded as the yellow drop in the sky.

Somadeva (sō-mā-dā'vā). The author of the Kathasaritsagara (which see).

Somain (sō-mān'). A mining and manufacturing town in the department of Nord, France, 12 miles west of Valenciennes. Population, (1891), commune, 6,043.

Somali (sō-mā'lē), or Somal (sō-māl'). A Hamitic nation inhabiting the Eastern Horn of Africa—that is, the arid region between the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb and a point south of the Juba River. They are mixed with Arab blood in the north and with Negro blood in the south, and vary, therefore, much in color and form. Their language, which is practically one in the whole region, is decidedly Hamitic, and has no written character or literature. The Somali are pastoral, owning herds of camels, horses, oxen, sheep, and goats; their limited agriculture is carried on by domestic slaves. Nominally Mohammedan and split into many petty tribes, they are fiercely opposed to foreign intrusion, though naturally sociable and jovial. The Hashia and Hawiya are the principal subtribes. Eogland and Italy claim most of the Somali coast.

Somali Coast Protectorate, or Somaliland (sō-mā'lē-land). A British protectorate in eastern Africa, along the Gulf of Aden. Chief seaport, Berbera. Area, 68,000 square miles. Population (1891), estimated, 240,000.

Somaliland. An Italian protectorate on the eastern coast of Africa. It extends from the Juba River northward, and is bounded westward by British East Africa. The British boundary was settled in 1891. Area of Somaliland and Gallaland, 70,000 square miles (?). Population, 210,000 (?).

Somanatha (sō-mā-nā'thā). The name of a celebrated Linga, or emblem of Shiva, or of the temple where it was set up at Somanathapatana, or Somnath Pattan, in the peninsula of Kathiawar in Guzerat. The temple was one of 12 Linga temples held in special veneration. A legend devised to explain the name, the precise meaning of which is uncertain, relates that Soma propitiated Shiva by great austerities performed there, whereupon Shiva granted him a boon, and Soma set up a Linga on the spot where he had done penance. This makes the name mean 'the lord of Soma,' in the sense of the divinity set up by Soma.

Sombrette (sōm-brā-rā'tā). A decayed mining town in the state of Zacatecas, Mexico, about 100 miles northwest of Zacatecas. Its silver-mines were formerly among the richest in the world.

Somers (sum'ēr-z), John, Baron Somers. Born at Worcester, England, March 4, 1652; died April 26, 1716. An English statesman and jurist. He was counsel for the seven bishops in their trial in 1683; and a member of the Convention Parliament in 1689. He became solicitor-general in 1689, attorney-general in 1692, and lord keeper in 1693. He was a leading member of the Whig junto; was one of the lords justices in the absence of William III. in 1695; was raised to the peerage in 1697; was lord chancellor 1697-1700; and was impeached and acquitted in 1701. In 1706 he was influential in arranging the union with Scotland. From 1708-1710 he was president of the council.

Somerset (sum'ēr-set). [ME. Somerset, Somersete, AS. Sumorsæte, orig. the name of the inhabitants, appar. 'summer-settlers,' from sumor, summer, and -sæte, settler; an explanation reflected in the ML. translation Æstiva regio, summer country, and the W. Gwlad yr haf, country of summer.] A county in the southwestern part of England, bounded by the Bristol Channel and Gloucester on the north, Wiltshire on the east, Dorset on the southeast, and Devon on the south, southwest, and west. Its surface is hilly and undulating, the chief hills being the Mendip Hills, Exmoor, and Brendon Hills, and it contains the plain of Sedgemoor. The principal rivers are the Parret and Lower Avon; the chief cities, Bath and (part of) Bristol. Somerset was thoroughly occupied by the Romans; was conquered gradually from the Welsh from the 6th to the 8th century; and sided generally with the Parliament and later with Monmouth in the 17th century. Area, 1,630 square miles. Population (1891), 484,337.

Somerset, Duke of (Edmund Beaufort). Died 1455. An English politician, son of Thomas, earl of Dorset, and grandson of John of Gaunt. He was created duke of Somerset in 1447, and was lieutenant of France 1447-50, during which time Normandy was lost by the English. He was appointed lord high constable of England on his return in 1450, and succeeded Suffolk as the chief minister of Henry VI. In 1453, when the king was stricken with insanity, Somerset supported Queen Margaret in her contest for the regency with the Duke of York, the heir presumptive to the throne. York triumphed, and Somerset was imprisoned. Somerset was, however, released and restored to office on the recovery of the king in 1455, but fell at the battle of St. Albans in the same year. Soosa. See Susa (in Tunis).

Sopherim (sō'fe-rim). [Heb.] Writers; scribes. In the Old Testament the title Sopher is applied to Ezra, who is called "a ready scribe in the law of Moses" (Ezra vii. 6). It was in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah, when the law became the center of Jewish life, that the institution of the Sopherim took its origin. The task of these men was to explain the law, and to adapt it to the ever-changing conditions and requirements of daily life. They were thus, in a measure, the successors and followers of the prophets. As the name would indicate, they were also engaged in multiplying copies of the Torah (Pentateuch) by writing, or by transcribing it from the old Hebrew script, no longer intelligible to their generation, into the square characters still in use. The Sopherim delivered their interpretations of and decisions on the law before audiences in schools. They were called collectively "the men of the great synagogue," and were succeeded by the Tanaim and Amoraim. The results of the mental activity of these teachers of the law through several centuries are laid down in the Talmud.

Sophia. See Sofia.

Sophia, Santa (sän'tä sō-fē'ü). [It. Santa Sofia, ML. Sancta Sophia, MGr. Σοφία, wisdom, the church being dedicated to Christ as the hypostatized wisdom of God.] The famous metropolitan church of the Greeks at Constantinople, built by Justinian: since 1453 a mosque. In plan it consists of outer and inner narthex preceding a square the central portion of which is covered by the great dome, 105 feet in diameter and 181 high (interior), in whose base open 40 arched windows. Most of the remainder of the nave is covered by two lower semi-domes, which buttress the central dome. The aisles have galleries resting on arcades with beautiful columns. All the vaults and arches are covered with superb mosaics on gold ground; all the human figures appearing in these are now masked with whitewash. The walls are incrustated with marbles. The exterior of the venerable church is now plain and unimpressive.

Sophia, Santa, The Little. The church of Sts. Sergius and Bacchus at Constantinople, finished by Justinian in 565 A. D., and now a mosque. It is quadrangular, with a dome and two tiers of vaulted arcades; there is a narthex and an apse, and fine mosaics under the whitewash.

Sophia Dorothea (sō-fē'ü dor-ō-thē'ü), Electress of Hannover. Born Sept. 15, 1666; died Nov. 13, 1726. Daughter of the Duke of Brunswick-Lüneburg-Celle, wife of the elector George of Hannover (later George I. of England), and mother of George II. She was divorced Dec. 28, 1694, on account of her relations with Count Königsmark, and remained for the rest of her life a prisoner in Ahlden Castle.

Sophie Charlotte, Queen of Prussia. Born Oct. 20, 1668; died Feb. 1, 1705. Wife of Frederick I., king of Prussia; noted for her literary and philosophical tastes. Charlottenburg was named from her.

Sophocles (sōf'ō-klēz). [Gr. Σοφοκλῆς.] Born at Colonus, near Athens, 495 or 496 B. C.; died 406 B. C. One of the three great tragic poets of Greece. He defeated Eschylus for the tragic prize in 468, and was defeated by Euripides in 441. He was one of the Athenian generals in the Samian war (440). He added the third actor to the drama, and made various changes in the chorus. His tragedies include "Edipus Tyrannus" (or "Edipus Rex"), "Edipus at Colonus," "Antigone," "Electra," "Philoctetes," "Ajax," and "Maidens of Trachis."

From this date till his death, at the age of 90, the poet devoted all his energy to the production of those famous works of art, which gave him such a hold over the Athenian public that he came to be considered the very ideal of a tragic poet, and was worshipped after his death as a hero, under the title Dexion. He is said to have won eighteen or twenty tragic victories, and, though sometimes postponed to Philocles and others, was never placed third in all his life. The author of the "Poetic" and the "Alexandrian" critics follow the judgment of the Attic public, and most modern critics have agreed with them that the tragedies of Sophocles are the most perfect that the world has ever seen.

Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I. 280.

Sophocles. A Greek portrait-statue, in the Lateran Museum, Rome. The face is full bearded; the attitude upright and simple; the drapery a closely wrapped himation. The style is of about 300 B. C. The statue is perhaps from a bronze original.

Sophocles, Evangelinus Apostolides. Born near Mount Pelion, Greece, March 8, 1807; died at Cambridge, Mass., Dec. 17, 1883. A Greek-American scholar, professor of Greek in Harvard College. He published a "Greek Grammar" (1838), and other works on Greek grammar, and a "Greek Lexicon of the Roman and Byzantine Periods" (1870).

Sophon (sō'fon), Bridge of. A bridge over the Sangarius, built A. D. 561 by Justinian. It survives almost perfect, except the structures for defense or shelter at the ends. It is 1,400 feet long, with 8 arches, each having a span of 75 feet and small arches on each side.

Sophonisba (sō-fō-niz'hä). Died about 204 B. C. A Carthaginian woman, daughter of Hasdrubal, son of Gisco. She was betrothed to the Numidian prince Masinissa, but was afterward married in 203 B. C., for political reasons, to Syphax, the rival Numidian ruler. Her husband was defeated by Masinissa, who acted as an ally of the Romans while Syphax was an ally of the Carthaginians, in the second Punic war. Sophonisba fell into the hands of the conqueror, who married her, but was compelled by Scipio to reject her. She died by poison sent by Masinissa to prevent her from falling into the hands of the Romans.

Sophonisba. A tragedy by Thomson, produced in 1730.

Sophonisba, or Hannibal's Overthrow. A tragedy by Nathaniel Lee, produced in 1676.

Sophonisbe. 1. A tragedy by Mairet, produced in 1631. It is said to be the first French tragedy, and is imitated from Trissino's "Sofonisba."—2. A tragedy by Corneille (1663).

Sophonon (sō'fōn). [Gr. Σόφωνα.] Lived about 440 B. C. A Syracusan writer of comedy, noted for his mimes. Fragments of his works have survived.

As to the controversy whether the mimes were in prose or in verse, I fancy them like Walt Whitman's so-called poems, which, if they survive, may yet give rise to a similar discussion. The mimes of Sophron were evidently very coarse also—another parallel—and were full of proverbs, and full of humor, often using patois, which is very rare in Greek literature. But Sophron's neglect of form did not imply a revolutionary creed; it was rather a carefully concealed submission to the laws of art.

Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., 1. 407.

Sophononia (sōf-rō'ni-ä). [Gr., 'of a sound mind.'] A character in Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered."

Sophy (sō'fī), The. A play by Sir John Denham, acted in 1641 at Blackfriars, and printed in 1642. It is founded on a story in Herbert's "Travels."

Sorau (sō'rou). A town in the province of Brandenburg, Prussia, situated 56 miles south-southeast of Frankfurt-on-the-Oder. It has manufactures of cloth, linen, etc., and is the oldest town in Lower Lusatia. Population (1890), 14,456.

Sorbonne (sor-bon'), La. A celebrated house founded in the University of Paris about 1250 by Robert de Sorbon or Sorbonne, chaplain and confessor of Louis IX. The college of the Sorbonne became one of the four constituent parts, and the predominant one, of the faculty of theology in the university. It exercised a high influence in ecclesiastical affairs and on the public mind, especially in the 16th and 17th centuries. It was suppressed during the Revolution, and deprived of its endowments. At the reconstruction of the university under Napoleon I., the building erected for it by Richelieu, and still called the Sorbonne, was ceded to the city of Paris on condition that the theological faculty, in connection with the faculties of science and belles-lettres, should remove there. New buildings were erected 1844–89.

Sordello (sor-del'lo), or Sordel. Born at Goito, near Mantua, about 1180; died about 1255. A Provençal poet or troubadour. He was attached for a time to the household of the Count of St. Bonifazio, the chief of the Guelph party, in the march of Treviso, and afterward entered the service of Raymond Berenger, the last Count of Provence of the house of Barcelona. It was thought at that time that the Italian language was not susceptible of polish, and Sordello wrote in the Provençal language. He gradually became in popular tradition a hero of romance, a preux chevalier, and an Italian knight errant. Many fables were woven about his name. It was even said that the sovereignty of Mantua had been bestowed upon him. He owes his reputation principally to Dante's mention of him: he speaks of him with admiration eight times in the "Purgatorio." Nothing survives of his prose or his Italian poems, but about 34 Provençal poems still exist, and are included in Raynaud's "Choix des poésies des troubadours" and his "Lexique roman."

Sordello of Mantua, whose real merit consists in the harmony and sensibility of his verses. He was amongst the first to adopt the ballad form of writing, and in one of those, which has been translated by Millot, he beautifully contrasts, in the burden of his ballad, the gaieties of nature and the ever-reviving grief of a heart devoted to love.

Sismondi, Lit. of South of Europe, 1. 103.

Sordello. A poem by Robert Browning, published in 1840. It is a picture of the restless and troubled condition of northern Italy in the early part of the 13th century, and a history of the development of the soul of Sordello the troubadour. It is the most obscure of Browning's poems.

Sothern (sō'th'ern), Edward Askew. Born at Liverpool, April 1, 1826; died at London, Jan. 20, 1881. An English-American comedian. He first played in Jersey in 1849; appeared in the United States in 1852; and in 1858 made his mark in the character of Lord Dundreary (see Dundreary). His two sons, Lytton and Edward, went on the stage; Lytton died in 1887.

Sothis (sō'this), or Sept (sept). The Egyptian name of the dog-star (Sirius).

Soto (sō'tō), Hernando or Fernando de. Born at Badajoz, Estremadura, in 1500 or 1501; died near the Mississippi River, May 21, 1542 (according to others, June 5 or June 30, 1542). A Spanish soldier, discoverer of the Mississippi. He went to Darien with Pedrarias, 1514; was with Córdoba in Nicaragua, 1524; had an encounter with Gil Gonzalez Davila, who had entered that country from the north; and opposed Córdoba's defection in 1525. In April, 1532, he joined Pizarro in the Gulf of Guayaquil with reinforcements; and thereafter was prominent in the conquest of Peru, returning to Spain very rich in 1536. In 1537 he was appointed governor of Cuba and Florida, with orders to explore and settle the latter country. Leaving San Lúcar in April, 1538, he finally sailed from Havana, Cuba, on May 12, 1539, with 9 vessels and 570 (or 950) men, including many cavaliers of rank; landed at Tampa Bay, May 25; and, having sent part of his ships back to Cuba, set out on July 15 to explore the interior. His route during the next three years can be determined only approximately. He was constantly urged forward by the hope of finding new and rich countries; during the winter months he halted at some Indian village; and he twice had communication with his vessels on the coast. Reckoning by the present State boundaries, he first made a great circuit northward through northern Florida, Georgia, perhaps the Carolinas and Tennessee, and Alabama, descending the Alabama River to Mobile Bay, where he had a fierce battle with the Indians (Oct., 1540). Thence he turned northward and northwestward through Mississippi; wintered at an Indian village on the Yazoo, where he had another battle; and reached the Mississippi River, crossing it at the Lower Chickasaw Bluffs about May, 1541. Subsequently he explored northward nearly to the Missouri, then turned southward, reached the junction of the Red River and the Mississippi, and died there of malarial fever: 250 of his men had perished. The survivors, under Moscoso, descended the river and reached Mexico. It should be noted that Alonso de Pineda discovered the mouth of the Mississippi (which he called the Espíritu Santo) in 1519, and that Cabeza de Vaca crossed it, near its mouth, in 1528.

Sotomayor, Melchor Bravo de Saravia. See Bravo de Saravia Sotomayor.

Sotomayor y Valdés (ē vāl-däs'), Ramon. Born at Santiago, April, 1830. A Chilean journalist, diplomatist, and historian. His most important work is "Historia de Chile" (2 vols. 1875), embracing the period from 1831 to 1871.

Soulé (sō-lä'), Pierre. Born at Castillon, France, in Sept., 1802; died at New Orleans, March 26, 1870. A French-American politician. He left France on account of his opposition to the government in 1825, and settled at New Orleans, where he rose to distinction as a lawyer. He was a Democratic United States senator from Louisiana 1847–53, and United States minister to Spain 1853–55. He was one of the framers of the Ostend Manifesto in 1854, and sided with the Confederacy during the Civil War. He was arrested at New Orleans in 1862 and imprisoned at Fort Lafayette, but obtained his release on condition that he would not return to the South until the suppression of the rebellion.

Soulouque (sō-lök'), Faustin Élie. Born at Petit Goïave, 1785; died there, Aug. 6, 1867. A Haitian general and politician. He was a negro slave; took part in the insurrection of 1803; rose to be general under Guerrier and Riché; and on the death of the latter was elected to the presidency, March 1, 1847, principally because he was old and ignorant and it was supposed that he would be a ready tool of the senators. He displayed an unexpected independence; secured the support of the blacks; and, though unsuccessful in an invasion of the Dominican Republic (March–April, 1849), had himself proclaimed emperor as Faustin I., Aug. 26, 1849. In 1855 he again invaded the Dominican Republic, but was defeated. He was deposed Dec. 22, 1858, left the country Jan. 15, 1859, and lived in exile until shortly before his death.

Sousa (sô'zä), Martim Affonso de. Born at Bragança about 1500; died at Lisbon, July 21, 1564. A Portuguese captain. He commanded the first expedition sent to Brazil for colonization (1530-33), and founded the first Portuguese settlement at São Vicente (which see) in hereditary right, and he continued to attend to its affairs though he did not again visit it personally. He was admiral of the seas of India 1534-40, commanding in several combats; and from 1542 to 1545 he was governor of the Portuguese East Indies.

Sousa, Pero Lopes de. Born about 1503; died on the coast of Madagascar, Dec. (?), 1539. A Portuguese captain, brother of M. A. de Sousa. He commanded two caravels in his brother's fleet (1530-33), and by his orders explored the lower Paraná (1531-32). He received, in hereditary right, three portions of Brazil, corresponding to northern Pernambuco and Parahyba, a portion of São Paulo, and Santa Catharina; some attempt was made to settle the two former through lieutenants whom he appointed. In 1539 he commanded a fleet sent to the East Indies, and was shipwrecked and killed while returning. He wrote an account of the Brazilian expedition which has been published in recent times.

Sousa, Thomé de. Born about 1510; died after 1563. A Portuguese administrator, first governor-general of Brazil (1549-53). He founded São Salvador, or Bahia, April, 1549.

South Africa (af'ri-kä). A name given collectively (and somewhat vaguely) to that portion of Africa south of the Zambesi and Angola, most of which is under British influence. The chief political divisions are Cape Colony, Natal, Basutoland, Bechuanaland, Pondoland, the territories of the British South Africa Company, the Orange River Colony, Transvaal Colony, and German Southwest Africa.

South Africa Company, British. See British South Africa Company.

South African Republic, now Transvaal (trans-väl') Colony. A British colony (formerly a republic) in South Africa. Capital, Pretoria. It is bounded by the British South Africa Company's territory on the north; Portuguese East Africa on the east; Zululand, Natal, and the Orange River Colony on the south; and the Bechuanaland Protectorate and colony on the west. The surface is a plateau, with the Drakensberg Mountains in the east. The chief river-systems are those of the Vaal and Limpopo. The colony exports wool, minerals, hides, ostrich-feathers, etc.; and is rich in gold, diamonds, iron, etc. It contains 18 districts. The government was a republic under a nominal British suzerainty, administered by a president (assisted by a council) and two Volksraden of 27 members each. The inhabitants are Boers, English, and natives (Bechuanas, Basutos, etc.). The prevailing religion is the Dutch Reformed. Immigration by Boers from Cape Colony commenced about 1836. The state was recognized as independent in 1852, and was annexed by Great Britain in 1877. A successful revolt of the Boers (1880-81) gained them self-government under British suzerainty. British control was restricted in 1884. In 1890 small portions of Swaziland and Amatongaland were ceded to the republic, and in 1895 a protectorate over Swaziland was established. In 1900-01 it was conquered and annexed by Great Britain. Area, 119,139 square miles. Pop., white (1890), 119,125; native (1894), est., 370,148; total (1896), est., 609,870.

South America (ä-mer'i-kä). The southern continental division of the New World, between the South Atlantic and Pacific oceans, connected with North America by the Isthmus of Panama. It forms a triangular mass with the southern angle lengthened out and terminating in the archipelago of Tierra del Fuego. The extreme points on the continent are Point Gallinas or Chimane, in Colombia, lat. 12° 25' N.; Cape Froward, on the Strait of Magellan, lat. 53° 54' S.; Ponta de Pedras, in Brazil, long. 44° 45' 52" W.; and Cape Parícuti, in northern Peru, long. 81° 10' 37" W. The coast-line presents no large indentations, but near the southern end it is broken by numerous small bays and channels cutting off islands. More than two thirds of the surface lies within the tropics. The principal mountain system is the Andean, near the western coast, dividing northward into three diverging chains, with an extension along the northern coast to the mouth of the Orinoco. A notable feature of this system is the giant volcanoes of the Pacific border. (See Andes, Cordilleras, Acconayua, Sorata, Chimboraço, Cotopaxi, Illimani, etc.) There is a smaller mountain system near the southeastern coast in Brazil, and some of the highlands of Guiana and Venezuela are mountainous in character. Three great river-systems, the Orinoco, Amazon, and Paraguay-Paraná, occupy corresponding broad depressions, which are but slightly raised above the sea-level. Separated by them are the great table-land of Brazil, with its mountains near the coast; the tableland of Guiana; and similar tablelands bordering the Andean system. These tablelands are diversified in their vegetation, but with little forest except near rivers. The most extensive forests are in the Amazon valley, and on the mountains of the northern and southeastern coasts. The llanos, north of the Orinoco, and the pampas of the Argentine Republic, are great grassy plains. The fauna and flora are extremely rich in species; there are, however, but few large mammals. South America was discovered by Columbus in 1498, and its continental character was ascertained before 1515. It was conquered by the Spaniards and Portuguese; and their descendants, with Indians, negroes, and mixed races, form the bulk of the modern population. The Dutch and French had short-lived colonies in Brazil; and the English, Dutch, and French established colonies in Guiana which still exist. Brazil represents the Portuguese conquests; the other South American republics correspond to Spanish colonies, but have undergone some changes since the independence. The independent states are Brazil, Uruguay, Paraguay, the Argentine Republic, Chile, Bolivia, Peru, Ecuador, Colombia (including the Isthmus of Panama), and Venezuela. British, French, and Dutch Guiana are colonies of European powers. Large portions of the interior are inhabited only by scattered Indian tribes, and the boundaries of the republics in these regions are still unsettled. Extreme length, 4,592 miles. Greatest breadth, 3,230 miles. Estimated area, with the dependent islands, 7,681,420 square miles. Population (1897), est., 40,000,000.

South American Revolution. The political movement and war by which the Spanish South American colonies became independent. The principal causes were the restrictions on commerce in favor of Spanish monopolies, burdensome taxes, and unjust laws; exclusion of the colonists from high offices; the Inquisition; and the examples of France and the United States. The immediate cause was the chaotic condition of Spanish affairs produced by Napoleon's invasion of Spain. Most of the colonists refused to recognize Joseph Bonaparte; and the junta of Seville, which had represented the legitimate monarch, having fallen, the authority of the viceroys and captains-general disappeared ipso facto. Under these circumstances, revolts broke out almost simultaneously in Venezuela (April 9, 1810), New Granada (July 20-21, 1810), Buenos Ayres (May 22, 1810), and Chile (July 16, 1810), the royal officers in each case being deposed and juntas established with the avowed purpose of holding the countries for Ferdinand VII.; later all of them declared their independence of Spain. In Peru, which was the center of Spanish power, there was no outbreak until much later. The Spanish officers, adhering to Joseph Bonaparte or to one of the Spanish juntas, regarded the colonists as rebels. War broke out at once, and at first the patriots were generally successful. In Venezuela the great earthquake of May 26, 1812, paralyzed the country. The Spaniards, taking advantage of the confusion, marched on Caracas; Miranda capitulated (July 25), and was sent a prisoner to Spain; and the Spanish general Monteverde obtained entire control. His cruelties provoked fresh outbreaks, led by Bolívar and Marino; but the defeats of La Puerta (June 14, 1814) and Urica (Dec. 5) forced the patriot leaders to abandon the country. Shortly after Morillo arrived with a large force from Spain; occupied Venezuela; took Cartagena after a disastrous siege (Dec. 6, 1815); and captured Bogotá May 6, 1816. In a short time all of northern South America was in his power. The patriots in Chile, weakened by party strife, had to meet forces sent from Peru; they were defeated at Rancagua (Oct. 2, 1814), and the leaders fled over the Andes. Upper Peru (Bolivia) was, from 1810 to 1816, the field of a continuous struggle between the royalists, strongly aided from Peru, and the patriots, supported by armies sent from Buenos Ayres. The royalist general Goyeneche swept the country in 1814, and thereafter the war took on a guerrilla character, for which the mountain-land was especially fitted. A formidable revolt in Peru, led by the Indian Pumacagua, was ended by his defeat at Umachiri, March 11, 1815. Thus, in the middle of 1816, the Platine provinces were the only ones which retained their independence. At the outbreak of the revolt the royalist forces under Elío had been besieged in Montevideo, which was taken by the patriots in June, 1814. Paraguay proclaimed its independence in May, 1811, but soon submitted to the dictatorship of Francia, and took no further part in the struggle. The government of Buenos Ayres was at first very weak, and was frequently changed; in 1813 it was centralized under a supreme director, and thereafter it showed more strength. San Martín, who had come into prominence as a military leader, conceived the plan of invading Peru by way of Chile, and to this end massed an army in Mendoza. Meanwhile Bolívar returned in 1816 to Venezuela, and in July, 1817, established a patriot central government at Angostura, on the Orinoco. The subsequent events may be reduced to two great movements under Bolívar and San Martín, centering on the Spanish power in Peru. Bolívar's victories of Boyacá (Aug. 7, 1819) and Carabobo (June 24, 1821), and that of his general Sucre at Pelducillo (May 24, 1822), were the principal events which secured the independence of New Granada, Venezuela, and Quito or Ecuador; these countries united in the republic of Colombia. (See Bolívar.) San Martín crossed the Andes Jan., 1817, and gained the battle of Chacabuco Feb. 12. The independence of Chile was proclaimed Feb. 12, 1818, and practically secured by the victory of Maipo April 5, 1818. Aided by Cochrane's fleet, San Martín invased Peru (Aug., 1820), and took Lima (July 9, 1821); but, after an interview with Bolívar at Guayaquil (July, 1822), he resigned and left the country. (See San Martín.) The viceroy of Peru, La Serna, driven into the interior, led the final struggle against Bolívar. The crowning events of the war were the victory at Junín (Aug. 6, 1824), and the final defeat and capture of La Serna by Sucre at the battle of Ayacucho (Dec. 9, 1824). The remnants of the Spanish forces were soon driven from Upper Peru, which became the republic of Bolivia. Callao Castle, the last Spanish stronghold, surrendered Jan. 19, 1826, thus ending the war.

Southampton (south-amp'ton or suth-hamp'ton). A seaport in Hampshire, England, situated on a peninsula at the head of Southampton Water, at the mouths of the Test and the Itchen, in lat. 50° 54' N., long. 1° 24' W. It is one of the principal seaports of Great Britain; the terminus of steamer lines to France, Ireland, North and South America, the West Indies, the Pacific, and Cape Colony; and a port of call for various transatlantic lines. It has extensive docks and ship-building industries, and has relics of old fortifications. It is noted for its double tides. It is a very ancient town. It was sacked by the Danes; was the place of embarkation of Richard the Lion-Hearted for the third Crusade in 1199, of Edward III. in 1345, and of Henry V. in 1415; was attacked by the French and Genoese in 1338; and was the place where the Pilgrim Fathers embarked on the Mayflower in 1620. Population (1901), 104,911.

South Carolina (kar-ö-li'nä). One of the South Atlantic States of the United States of America. Capital, Columbia; chief city, Charleston. It is bounded by North Carolina on the north and northeast, the Atlantic Ocean on the southeast, and Georgia (separated for most of the distance by the Savannah River) on the southwest and west. The surface is level near the coast, hilly and undulating in the interior, and mountainous in the northwest. The principal rivers are the Great Pedee, Santee, Edisto, and Savannah. The State has gold, porcelain clay, and other minerals, and is especially noted for the production of rice and sea-island cotton. It has 41 counties, sends 2 senators and 7 representatives to Congress, and has 9 electoral votes. A majority of the inhabitants are negroes. An unsuccessful attempt to colonize was made by the French under Ribault in 1562. The first permanent settlement was made by the English in 1670. Charleston was founded in 1680. The territory remained under a proprietary government with North Carolina until 1721, when it became a separate crown colony. Many of the early colonists were French Huguenots, Scotch-Irish, Swiss, and Germans. South Carolina was one of the 13 original States (1776). It was the scene of many battles in the Revolution (Fort Moultrie, Charleston, Camden, King's Mountain, Cowpens, Futaw Springs), and of many partisan contests, and was held by the British 1780-1781. Its advocacy of nullification nearly led to civil war in 1832-33. It took the lead in advocating States-rights doctrines, and was the first State to secede (Dec. 20, 1860). It opened the Civil War by the bombardment of Fort Sumter, April 12, 1861, and suffered severely by the blockade, attacks on Charleston Harbor, and the march of Sherman's army in 1865. It was readmitted in 1868. The State was visited by a severe earthquake in 1886. In 1892 the sale of liquors was restricted to State dispensaries, and the constitutionality of the law (of 1893) was affirmed in 1894. Area, 30,570 square miles. Population (1900), 1,340,316.

Southcott (south'kòt). Joanna. Born in Devonshire, 1750; died Oct. 29, 1814. An English religious fanatic, originally a domestic servant. She became a Methodist, and, pretending supernatural gifts, dictated prophecies in rime, proclaimed herself to be the woman mentioned in the Apocalypse (ch. xii), and, although 64 years old, affirmed that she was to be delivered of "Shiloh" Oct. 19, 1814. She died of dropsy ten days later. Her sect numbered over 100,000, and was still in existence in 1889. She wrote the "Book of Wonders" (1813-14), etc.

Southey (suth'i or suth'i), Mrs. (Caroline Ann Bowles). Born at Lymington, Hants, England, Dec. 6, 1786; died there, July 20, 1854. An English poet and author, the second wife of Robert Southey whom she married in 1830. Among her works are the poems "Ellen Fitzarthur" (1820) and "The Widow's Tale, etc." (1822). Her collected poems were published in 1867. Among her prose works are "Chapters on Churchyards" (1829), "Selwyn in Search of a Daughter" (1835), etc. Her correspondence with Southey is her best-known work.

Southey, Robert. Born at Bristol, England, Aug. 12, 1774; died at Greta Hall, near Keswick, England, March 21, 1843. An English poet and prose-writer: one of the Lake School of poets. He went to Westminster School, but was expelled in 1792 for an essay on "Flogging" in the "Flagellant," a school magazine. He was refused admittance at Christ Church, Oxford, on account of this essay, but was admitted to Balliol. He made the acquaintance of Coleridge in 1794, and formed with him the scheme of an ideal colony, "Pantisocracy." He traveled in Spain and Portugal 1795-96; held for a short time a government sinecure; and settled down to literary work in 1804 at Greta Hall, near Keswick, where he collected a large library and wrote with great regularity. He was made poet laureate in 1813 and pensioned by the government. In 1839 he married his second wife, Caroline Bowles, and in the same year became demented, dying afterward of softening of the brain. His chief poems are "Joan of Arc" (1796), "Thalaba, the Destroyer" (1801), "Madoc" (1805), "The Curse of Kehama" (1810), "Roderick, the Last of the Goths" (1814), "A Vision of Judgment" (1821), etc. His prose works include "History of Brazil" (1810; still a standard work), "Life of Nelson" (1813), "Life of John Wesley" (1820), "History of the Expedition of Orsna and Crimes of Aguirre" (1821), "History of the Peninsular War" (1823), "Book of the Church" (1824), and "Sir Thomas More" (1829). He edited "The Pilgrim's Progress," with a life of John Bunyan (1830); wrote "The Doctor" (1834-37); and edited Cowper's works, with his life (1833-37). He also translated "Amadis de Gaul" (1805), "Palmerin of England" (1807), Esprilla's "Letters from England" (1807), and "Chronicle of the Cid" (1808). His "Common-Place Book" was edited in 1849-51, and his letters in 1856.

South Kensington Museum. One of the "subdivisions of the Department of Science and Art of the Committee of the Council on Education." The museum, which is in Brompton, in the western part of London, south of Hyde Park, was opened in 1857 for the purpose of promoting science and art. It contains a museum of ornamental or applied art, the National Gallery of British Art, an art library, the Royal College of Science, a science and education library, the National Art Training-Schools, etc. The museum is greatly indebted to private liberality in the loan of treasures of art, but the government has also purchased and presented to it much valuable material. The India Museum is now officially a part of it. The south and west galleries of the buildings used for the International Exhibition of 1871-74 now contain some of the collections of the South Kensington Museum, and the east gallery contains the India Museum. The Museum of Natural History, removed from the British Museum, is in a new building south of the International Exhibition Galleries, built in 1873-80. In 1899 extensive new buildings were begun, and the name was changed, by order of the Queen, to the Victoria and Albert Museum.

South Mountain. A ridge of the Alleghanies in western Maryland and southern Pennsylvania. A victory was gained here by the Federals under McClellan over the Confederates under Lee, Sept. 14, 1862. The loss of the Federals was 1,813; of the Confederates, 934. Called also the battle of Boonsboro.

South Sea. The name given to the Pacific by its discoverer, Balboa (1513). As the Isthmus of Panama, where he crossed it, runs nearly east and west, the Pacific forms its southern shore; hence, to the Spaniards on the Isthmus it was the South Sea. Until the 19th century this was the common name, sometimes employed in a special manner for the South Pacific. It is still frequently used. See Pacific Ocean.

Southsea (sòth'sè). An eastern suburb of Portsmouth, England.

South Sea Bubble. A financial scheme which originated in England about 1711 and collapsed in 1720. It was proposed by the Earl of Oxford to fund a floating debt of £10,000,000, the purchasers of which could become stockholders in a corporation, the South Sea Company, which was to have a monopoly of the trade with Spanish South America, and a part of the capital stock of which was to constitute the fund. The refusal of Spain to enter into commercial relations with England made the privileges of the company worthless; but, by means of a series of speculative operations and the infatuation of the people, its shares were inflated from £100 to £1,050. Its failure caused great distress throughout England.

South Shetland, or New South Shetland (shet'land). A group of islands in the Southern Ocean, south of Cape Horn, about lat. 60°-65° S.

South Shields (shèldz). A seaport in Durham, England, situated on the Tyne, at its mouth, opposite Tynemouth. It has coal-trade, ship-building, manufactures of glass, etc. Roman antiquities have been discovered there. Population (1901), 97,263.

The bishopric of Southwell comprises the counties of Nottingham and Derby and parts of the West Riding of Yorkshire. The minster is a Norman church with square central tower and two lofty western towers with pyramidal roofs. The nave is of the most massive Norman work, with round arches and huge cylindrical piers, a large and high triforium-gallery with great open round arches, and a very small clearstory. The roof is a barrel-vault of wood. The choir is of the most beautiful Early English, with two tiers of lancets in the square chevet. The length of the cathedral is 306 feet. Population (1891), 2,755.

Southwell, Robert. Born about 1562; executed at Tyburn, Feb. 22, 1595. An English poet and Jesuit martyr. He was educated at Paris, and in 1578 was received into the Society of Jesus. In 1587 he returned to England, became domestic chaplain to the Countess of Arundel, and wrote "Consolations for Catholics" and most of his poems. In 1592 he was betrayed to the authorities; was tortured and closely imprisoned for three years; and was tried at Westminster and executed. He wrote "St. Peter's Complaint" (his longest poem), and "The Burning Babe," much admired by Ben Jonson.

Southwold (south'wòld). A seaport in Suffolk, England, situated on the North Sea, at the mouth of the Blythe, 31 miles northeast of Ipswich. A naval battle, also called the battle of Solebay, was fought off Southwold in 1672 between the English and French fleets under the Duke of York (later James II), and the Dutch fleet under De Ruyter. The Dutch retired. Population (1891), 2,311.

Southworth (south'wèrth), Constant. Born at Leyden, Netherlands, 1614; died at Duxbury, Mass., about 1685. A colonist of New England, stepson of William Bradford: the reputed author of the "Supplement" to Morton's "Memorial."

Southworth, Mrs. (Emma D. E. Nevitt). Born at Washington, D. C., Dec. 26, 1818; died there, June 30, 1899. An American novelist. Among her novels are "Retribution," "The Deserted Wife," "The Mother-in-Law," "Children of the Isle," "The Foster Sisters," "The Bridal Eve," "The Fatal Marriage," "Vivia, or Secret of Power," etc.

Souvaroff. See Swaroff.

Souvestre (sò-vestr'), Émile. Born at Morlaix, France, April 15, 1806; died at Paris, July 5, 1854. A French novelist and dramatist. Among his works are "Derniers Bretons" (1835-37), "Le foyer breton" (1844), "Un philosophe sous les toits" (1850), "Causeries historiques et littéraires" (1854), etc.

Souvigny (sò-vèn-yè'). A town in the department of Allier, France, on the Quene 7 miles west-southwest of Moulins. The abbey church of the Cluniac priory is a notable monument of great size. The greater part is Romanesque; the remainder, with much of the vaulting, was rebuilt in the 15th century. There are double aisles and curious sculpture. This church was the ancestral burial-place of the Bourbon family, many of whose tombs remain in two rich Flamboyant chapels, inclosed by sculptured screens. Population (1891), commune, 3,291.

Sowerby Bridge. A manufacturing town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, England, situated on the Calder 10 miles southwest of Bradford. Population (1891), 10,408.

Sozomen (soz'ò-men) (Hermias Sozomenus). Born probably near Gaza, Palestine, about 400 A. D.; died about the middle of the 5th century. An ecclesiastical historian, author of a church history (edited by Valesius 1668).

The "ecclesiastical history" of Hermias Salamanes Sozomenus, commonly known as Sozomen, was nearly contemporary and coextensive with that of Socrates [Scholasticus], whom Sozomen is supposed to have copied, as far as at least as the plan of his work is concerned. It extends, as we now have it, from 324 to 415, but was designed to reach the year 439. It is divided into nine books, and is generally superior to the work of Socrates in elegance of style, though it often exhibits peculiarities which the other historian had avoided. Sozomen was born at Bethel, near Gaza, in Palestine, and spent most of his early years in the Holy Land, to which he makes familiar reference in several parts of his book.

Spain (spän). [Sp. España, Pg. Hespanha, It. Spagna, D. Spanje, F. Espagne, L. Hispania and Iberia, Gr. Ἰσπανία, Ἑσπερία (western land), and Ἰβηρία.] A kingdom of southwestern Europe, which occupies the greater part of the Iberian or Spanish peninsula. Capital, Madrid. It is bounded by the Bay of Biscay and France on the north, the Mediterranean on the east and south, the Strait of Gibraltar and the Atlantic on the southwest, and Portugal and the Atlantic on the west. The interior is occupied by table-lands; and there are numerous mountain-ranges, including the Cantabrian Mountains, Sierra de Guadarrama, Sierra de Gredos, Mountains of Toledo, Sierra de Guadalupe, Sierra Morena, and Sierra Nevada. The principal rivers are the Ebro, Guadalquivir, Guadiana, Tago, Duero, and Miño. Spain has very valuable mineral resources (especially quicksilver, lead, copper, silver, salt, zinc). Other leading products are wine (sherry, Malaga, etc.), grapes, raisins, olive-oil, oranges, figs, and other fruits, and cork. It comprises 47 provinces on the mainland (formed from the 13 old provinces) and 2 insular provinces (Canaries and Balearic Islands). The government is a hereditary constitutional monarchy. The legislative body is the Cortes, composed of a senate and a chamber of deputies. The prevailing religion is Roman Catholic. The language is Spanish. The early inhabitants were Celts and Iberians. Various coast towns were colonized by the Phenicians. The country was conquered in part by Carthage (Hamilcar, Hasdrubal, and Hannibal), 237-219 B. C. The period of Roman conquest (under the Scipios, Cato, Gracchus, Pompey, etc., against Carthage, Viriathus, Numantia, the Celtiberians, Sertorius, the Cantabri, etc.) extended from about 205 to 19 B. C. Spain was ravaged by Vandals, Suevi, and Alani in 409 A. D. A West-Gothic kingdom was established in 418, and overthrown by the Saracens in 711, and the Omniad kingdom was established at Cordova in 756. An invasion by Charles the Great led to the foundation of the "Spanish Mark." The Omniad dynasty ended in 1031. Christian kingdoms were founded—that of Asturias (later Leon) in the 8th century, Navarre in the 9th century, Castile in 1033, and Aragon in 1035. Toledo was taken from the Moors by Castile at the close of the 11th century. The Almoravides had a realm in Spain in the 11th and 12th centuries; the Almohades in the 12th and 13th centuries. Castile and Aragon were united in 1479. Granada was taken from the Moors in 1492. Spain reached its greatest power in the 16th century. The Hapsburg dynasty ruled from 1516 to 1700, when the Bourbons succeeded them. The throne was given to Joseph Bonaparte in 1808. The Peninsular war lasted from 1808 to 1814. The revolution of 1820 was suppressed with French help in 1823. The first Carlist war was carried on from 1833 to 1840. Isabella II. was de throne in 1868; and Amadeus reigned 1870-73. The republic formed in 1873 was overthrown and the Bourbons were restored in 1875. There was a second Carlist war 1872-76. The foreign dependencies of Spain were reduced, by the Spanish-American war and the sale of the Carolines and Ladrones to Germany, to her possessions in western Africa. Area, 197,670 square miles. Population (1897), 13,083,500.

Spain, Era of. An era, long used in Spain, which began with the first day of the year 38 B. C.

Spalatin (spä-lä-tän'), Georg (originally Burckhard). Born at Spalt, Bavaria, Jan. 17, 1484; died Jan. 16, 1545. A noted German Reformer, a friend of Luther. He was in the diplomatic and other service of Frederick the Wise, elector of Saxony, and his successors. He wrote various historical works.

Spalato (spä-lä-tō), or Spalatro (spä-lä-trō). [From L. palatium, palace (the palace of Diocletian); Slav. Spilit.] A seaport in Dalmatia, Austria-Hungary, situated on the Adriatic in lat. 43° 30' N., long. 16° 27' E., near the site of the ancient Salona. It has the largest trade in Dalmatia. It is noted for its Roman antiquities, especially for the ruins of the palace of Diocletian, built about 300, an agglomeration of highly ornamented structures enclosed by a fortified wall forming approximately a rectangle of 600 by 700 feet. Streets connecting the great gates in the middle of each side divide the whole into 4 blocks. The present spacious arcaded Piazza del Duomo is the great court of the palace, on the south side of which are vestibule, atrium, and remains of a beautiful series of rooms. Flanking the great courts are areas containing the imperial mausoleum (now the cathedral) and a temple of Esculapius. The arches of the great court are of importance in architecture, as the earliest which can be precisely dated that spring directly from columns without the intervention of an entablature. This marks the development from Roman architecture of the germ of the medieval. When Salona was destroyed by the Avars, about 610, fugitives from that place took refuge in the ruins of the palace. Population (1890), commune, 22,752.

Fast by the bay, with the high mountain at his back, with the lower hills on each side of him, Diocletian built his villa, his palace, of Salona. The prouder name, the name which savoured of the Rome which Diocletian had forsaken, clung to the spot, and the city which in after ages grew up within the palatium of Diocletian still bears the name of Spalato. Freeman, Hist. Essays, III. 44.

Spalding (späl'ding). A town in Lincolnshire, England, situated on the river Welland 34 miles south-southeast of Lincoln. Population (1891), 9,014.

Spalding, Martin John. Born in Marion County, Ky., May 23, 1810; died at Baltimore, Feb. 7, 1872. An American Roman Catholic prelate. He was bishop of Louisville, and became archbishop of Baltimore in 1864; was president of the second plenary council in Baltimore in 1866; and was prominent as a delegate to the Vatican Council 1869-70. He wrote "Evidences of Catholicity" (1847), "History of the Protestant Reformation in Germany and Switzerland" (1860), a translation of Darra's "General History of the Catholic Church" (1866).

Spalding, William. Born at Aberdeen, Scotland, 1809; died Nov. 16, 1859. A Scottish critic, philosopher, and miscellaneous writer. He was admitted to the bar at Edinburgh in 1833, and was professor of rhetoric at Edinburgh University 1834-45, and professor of logic at the University of St. Andrews from 1845 until his death. He wrote "Italy and the Italian Islands" (1841), "History of English Literature" (1852), etc.

Spandau (spän'dou). A town in the province of Brandenburg, Prussia, situated at the junction of the Spree and Havel, 8 miles west by north of Berlin. It is an important fortress, and the Julius Tower in the citadel contains the imperial war treasure. It has a cannon-foundry, a small-arms factory, a school of musketry, artillery workshops, etc. Population (1890), 45,365.

Spanish America. A collective name for those portions of America which were settled by the Spaniards, and are now inhabited by their descendants—that is, the whole of South America except Brazil and the Guianas, Central America, Mexico, Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Dominican Republic, with some small islands of the West Indies.

Spanish-American War. A war between Spain and the United States in 1898, waged by the latter for the liberation of Cuba. Its chief events were the breaking off of diplomatic relations by Spain April 21; beginning of the blockade of Cuba April 22; declaration of war by Spain April 24, and by the United States April 25; destruction of Spanish fleet in the Bay of Manila May 1; arrival of Cervera's squadron at Santiago May 19; sinking of the Merrimac in the entrance to Santiago harbor June 3; landing of United States troops at Baiquiri June 20-23; battles of San Juan and El Cancey July 1-2; attempted escape and destruction of Cervera's squadron July 3; surrender of Santiago July 17; campaign in Porto Rico July 25-Aug. 12; signing of peace protocol Aug. 12; capture of Manila Aug. 13; signing of treaty of peace at Paris Dec. 10. By the treaty Spain relinquished her sovereignty over Cuba, and ceded Porto Rico, Guahan in the Ladrones, and the Philippines to the United States.

Spanish Armada, The. 1. See Armada.—2. Mr. Puff's tragedy rehearsed in Sheridan's "dramatic piece" "The Critic."

Spanish Barber, The, or the Fruitless Precaution. A comedy by George Colman the elder, taken from "Le Barbier de Séville" of Beaumarchais, and produced at London in 1777.

Spanish Curate, The. A play by Fletcher and Massinger, licensed in 1622, printed in 1647. Several alterations of it have been acted. The plot is from a Spanish story, called in English "Gerardo the Unfortunate Spaniard," by Cespedes.

Spanish Fury, The. A name given to the sack of Antwerp by Spanish troops in 1576.

Spanish Gypsy, The. 1. A play by Middleton (with Rowley), acted 1623, printed 1653. It is founded on Cervantes's "Fuerza de la Sangre" and "La Gitana."—2. A poem by George Eliot, published in 1868.

Spanish Main, The. A name applied, somewhat vaguely, to the northern coast of South America, from the mouth of the Orinoco westward. Sometimes it included the Isthmus of Panama and Central America, or all the continental lands bordering on the Caribbean Sea, as distinguished from the islands. The term was probably derived from the Spanish Tierra Firme, or Costa Firme, used in the 16th century for the continental coast from Paria to Costa Rica, and in a more restricted sense for the Isthmus. Many modern writers appear to suppose that the Spanish Main was the Caribbean Sea (a popular use of the name).

Spanish Mark, The. A Frankish possession, conquered by Charles the Great, situated in the northeastern extremity of Spain. It was ruled by counts of Barcelona, and became merged in Catalonia, and finally in Aragon.

Spanish Molière, The. Moratin.

Spanish Moor's Tragedy, The. A play by Thomas Dekker, Day, and Haughton, licensed in 1600 and printed in 1657.

Spanish Peaks. Two isolated mountains of conical shape, in southern Colorado, near the boundary of New Mexico, which rise to an elevation of nearly 14,000 feet. They are very prominent landmarks. Their aboriginal name is Huajatoyas.

Spanish Succession, War of the. A war arising out of disputes about the succession in Spain on the death of Charles II., fought 1701-14 between the emperor and the naval powers on the one hand, and France and its allies on the other. The question of the succession agitated the various cabinets for many years before the extinction of the Hapsburg dynasty in Spain by the death of Charles II., as it involved the balance of power in Europe. There were three claimants: Louis XIV. of France, the emperor Leopold I., and the electoral prince of Bavaria (see the extract). As England and Holland would not allow the Spanish possessions to be united intact to the French or Austrian monarchy, Leopold asserted his claim in behalf of his second son Charles, while Louis urged his in behalf of his grandson Philip of Anjou. Treaties of partition were made in 1698 and 1700 dividing the inheritance between the claimants (see Partition Treaties), but when the vacancy occurred in 1700 Louis decided to ignore his treaty obligations, and recognized Charles II.'s will, which made Philip of Anjou heir. He found himself opposed in Sept., 1701, by the Grand Alliance of the Hague between England, Holland, Austria, and the Empire, joined later by Portugal, while his only allies were the Elector of Bavaria and the dukes of Modena and Savoy. Spain, indeed, sided with him, but had neither money nor men. The most conspicuous leaders of the Grand Alliance were the English general Marlborough, the imperial general Prince Eugene, and Heinsius, pensionary of Holland. The seat of the war was principally Italy, the Netherlands, and Germany. The chief events were the victory of Eugene and Marlborough over the Bavarians and French under Tallard at Blenheim, Aug. 13, 1704; the victory of Marlborough over Villeroi at Ramillies, May 23, 1706; the victory of Eugene and Leopold of Dessau over Marsin and the Duke of Orleans at Turin, Sept. 7, 1706; the victory of the French under Berwick at Almansa, April 25, 1707; the victory of Marlborough and Eugene over Vendôme and the Duke of Burgundy at Oudenarde, July 11, 1708; and the victory of Marlborough and Eugene over Villars at Malplaquet, Sept. 11, 1709. The death of the emperor Joseph, the eldest son and successor of Leopold I., in 1711, placed Charles on the imperial throne, thus removing the chief obstacle to the recognition of Philip of Anjou (the electoral prince of Bavaria having died in 1699). The war was ended by the peace of Utrecht (which see) in 1713, and that of Rastatt and Baden in 1714, Philip of Anjou being recognized as king of Spain under the title of Philip V.

Spanish Town, or Santiago de la Vega (sän-té-ä'gō dä lä vä'gä). A town in Jamaica, situated on the river Cobre about 10 miles west of Kingston. Population (1891), 5,019.

Spanish Tragedy, The, or Hieronimo (Jeronimo) is Mad Again! A play by Thomas Kyd, the continuation of another play usually called "The First Part of Hieronimo." It was licensed in 1592, and in 1602 was altered by Jonson. See Jeronimo.

Spanker (späng'kör), Lady Gay. A brilliant character in Dion Boucicault's comedy "London Assurance." She is devoted to horses and hunting, and keeps the whip-hand of her meek little husband, Dolly Spanker.

Sparagus Garden, The, or Tom Hoyden of Taunton Dean. A comedy by Brome, acted in 1635 and printed in 1640.

Sparkish (spär'kish). A character in Wycherley's "Country Wife." He is the original of Congreve's Tattle.

The character of Sparkish is quite new, and admirably hit off. He is an exquisite and seducing coxcomb; a pretender to wit and letters, without common understanding, or the use of his senses. Hazlitt, Eng. Poets, p. 101.

Sparks (spärks), Jared. Born at Willington, Conn., May 10, 1789; died at Cambridge, Mass., March 14, 1866. An American historian. He graduated at Harvard in 1815, and became a Unitarian clergyman. He was pastor of a church in Baltimore 1819-23; was editor of the "North American Review" 1824-31; was professor of history at Harvard 1830-40; and was president of Harvard 1849-53. He was also the founder and first editor of the "American Almanac and Repository of Useful Knowledge" (Boston, 1830-61). He wrote, among other works, the "Life of John Ledyard" (1825) and the "Life of Gouverneur Morris" (1832), and edited "Diplomatic Correspondence of the American Revolution" (12 vols. 1829-30), "Writings of George Washington, with a Life of the Author" (12 vols. 1834-38), "Library of American Biography" (1834-38; writing the lives of Arnold, Ethan Allen, Marquette, La Salle, etc.), "Works of Benjamin Franklin, with a Life of the Author" (10 vols. 1836-40), and "Correspondence of the American Revolution" (1834), etc.

Sparta (spär'tä), or Lacedæmon (lus-e-dæ'mon). [Gr. Σπάρτη, Λακεδαιμόν.] An ancient city of Laconia, Greece, situated on the Eurotas in lat. 37° 5' N., long. 22° 24' E. It became powerful after the legislation of Lycurgus in the 6th century B. C.; conquered Messenia in the 8th and 9th centuries; was the leading Greek state by the 5th century, and the champion of aristocratic government; took a leading part in the Persian war; and with allies fought against Athens in the Peloponnesian war. The years 604-371 were the period of Spartan hegemony. Sparta passed under Roman rule in 146 B. C.

Spartacus (spär'tu-kns). Killed 71 B. C. A Thracian who became a Roman slave and gladiator in Capua. He headed an insurrection of slaves in Italy in 73 B. C., and routed several Roman armies, but was ultimately defeated by Crassus on the Silarus, and slain.

Spartel (spär'tel'), Cape. The northwesternmost point of Africa, situated in Morocco, at the entrance to the Strait of Gibraltar, in lat. 35° 47' N., long. 5° 56' W.

Spartianus (spär-ti-ä'nus), Ælius. Lived at the end of the 3d century A. D. A Roman historian, one of the authors of the "Augustan History." He composed the lives of Verus, Severus, Niger, etc.

Spartivento (spär-tē-ven'tō). Cape. 1. A cape at the southern extremity of Italy, in lat. 37° 55' 29" N., long. 16° 3' 31" E.: the ancient Hercules promontorium. — 2. A cape at the southern extremity of the island of Sardinia, in lat. 38° 52' 34" N., long. 8° 51' 8" E.

Spasmodic School, The. A name given collectively to various 19th-century writers, on account of their alleged unnatural style; among them were Gerald Massey, Sydney Dobell, Bailey, Gilfillan, Alexander Smith, and others.

Its adherents, lacking perception and synthesis, and mistaking the materials of poetry for poetry itself, aimed at the production of quotable passages, and crammed their verse with mixed and conceited imagery, gushing diction, interjections, and that mockery of passion which is but surface-deep. Stedman, Victorian Poets, p. 262.

Specie Circular, The. In United States history, an order by the secretary of the treasury, July 11, 1836, which directed that payment for public lands should be made to government agents in gold and silver only (except in certain cases in Virginia). It was designed to check speculative purchases of public lands.

Spectator (spek-tā'tor). The. An English periodical, published daily from March 1, 1711, to Dec. 6, 1712. It comprised 555 numbers, of which 274 were by Addison ("Sir Roger de Coverley" papers, critiques on "Paradise Lost," etc.), 236 by Steele, 1 by Pope ("The Messiah," No. 378), and 19 by Hughes. Enstace Budzell also contributed to it. Addison killed Sir Roger de Coverley in No. 517, "that nobody else might murder him." It was revived in 1714.

Specter of the Brocken. See Brocken.

Speculum Salutis (spek'ū-lum sal-ū'tis), or Speculum Humanæ Salvationis (spek'ū-lum hū-mā-nē sal-vā-ti-ō'nis). [L., 'mirror of safety,' or 'of man's salvation.'] An early book in Latin rime, in 45 chapters. It tells the incidents of the Bible story from the fall of Lucifer to the redemption. There are manuscript copies as old as the 12th century. It is of great interest in relation to the invention of printing. The earliest date which can be assigned to the printed book is 1467.

The "Speculum" was printed at different times and places during the fifteenth century, but the copies of greatest value are those which belong to four correlated editions—two in Latin and two in Dutch—all without date, name, or place of printer. In these four editions the illustrations are obviously impressions from the same blocks; but each edition exhibits some new peculiarity in the shape or disposition of the letters. Those who favor the theory of an invention of typography in Holland maintain that these letters are the impressions of the first movable types, and that the curious workmanship of the book marks the development of printing at the great turning-point in its progress when it was passing from xylography to typography. De Vinne, Invention of Printing, p. 249.

Spedding (sped'ing), James. Born at Mirehouse, near Bassenthwaite, June, 1808; died, from an injury, at St. George's Hospital, London, March 9, 1881. An English editor of Bacon. He entered Cambridge (Trinity College) in 1827; from 1837 to 1841 was a clerk in the Colonial Office; and in 1843 was private secretary of Lord Ashburton in America. From 1857 to 1874 he published "Works, Life, and Letters of Bacon." In 1878 he published an "Account of the Life and Times of Bacon," and in 1881 "Studies in English History," etc.

Speed (spēd). Servant of Valentine, in Shakspeare's "Two Gentlemen of Verona."

Speed (spēd), John. Born at Farrington, Cheshire, 1542; died at London, July 28, 1629. An English antiquary. He wrote a "History of Great Britain under the Conquests of the Romans, Saxons, Danes, and Normans" (1611) and "Theater of the Empire of Great Britain" (1611).

Speed the Plough. A comedy by Thomas Morton, produced in 1798.

Speedwell (spēd'wel). A ship of about 60 tons burden, bought and fitted out in Holland, which sailed from Southampton with the Mayflower in 1615 for New England. She was sent back from Plymouth, England, owing to a series of mishaps, and those of the "pilgrims" who were disheartened turned back with her.

Speicher (spi'cher). A manufacturing town in the canton of Appenzell Outer Rhodes, Switzerland, 21 miles southeast of Constance. Here, in 1493, the inhabitants of Appenzell defeated the troops of the Abbot of St. Gall.

Speichern. See Spichern.

Speier. See Speyer.

Speke (spēk), John Hanning. Born at Jordans, Somersetshire, May 4, 1827; died at Bath, England, Sept. 15, 1864. An African explorer. After military and scientific service in India, he accompanied Sir R. F. Burton to the great central African lakes (1855), and crossed the continent with Grant from Zanzibar over Victoria Nyanza and down the Nile to Egypt (1860-1863). He discovered the Victoria Nyanza and its affluent, the Kagera, or Alexandra Nile, the main source of the Nile. He published a "Journal of the Discovery of the Source of the Nile" (1863).

Spelman (spel'man), Sir Henry. Born at Congham, England, 1562; died at London, 1641. An English antiquary.

Spence (spens). Joseph. Born at Kingsclere, Hampshire, April 25, 1699; drowned at Byfleet, Surrey, Aug. 20, 1768. An English critic. His chief works are an "Essay on Pope's Translation of Homer" (1727), "Polymetis, etc." (a work on Roman art and poetry, 1747), and a volume of anecdotes, observations, and characters of books and men (an edition by Malone and one by Samuel Weller Singer were published in 1820, on the same day).

Spence, William. Born 1783; died at London, Jan. 6, 1860. An English entomologist. He collaborated with Kirby in his "Introduction to Entomology."

Spencer, Cape. A cape at the southern extremity of Yorke Peninsula, South Australia.

Spencer, Charles, third Earl of Sunderland. Born about 1674; died April 19, 1722. An English politician, son of the second Earl of Sunderland. He was envoy to Vienna in 1705; secretary of state 1707-10; lord lieutenant of Ireland 1714-15; lord privy seal 1715-17; secretary of state 1717-18; and first lord of the treasury and prime minister 1718-21. He was involved in the South Sea scheme.

Spencer, George John, second Earl Spencer. Born Sept. 1, 1758; died Nov. 10, 1834. An English bibliophile and politician. He collected a very valuable library, described in "Bibliotheca Spenceriana" (1814) by Dibdin.

Spencer, Herbert. Born at Derby, April 27, 1820. A celebrated English philosopher, founder of the system named by himself the synthetic philosophy. He was educated by his father, a schoolmaster at Derby, and by his uncle, the Rev. Thomas Spencer, rector of Hinton. He was articled to a civil engineer in 1837, but in 1845 abandoned engineering and devoted himself to literature. He was assistant editor of the "Economist" 1848-53, and in 1852 visited the United States, where he gave a number of lectures. His first effort in the field of general literature (he had previously published a number of professional papers in the "Civil Engineers' and Architects' Journal") was a series of letters to the "Nonconformist" on "The Proper Sphere of Government," which appeared in 1842 and was reprinted in pamphlet form in the following year. In 1855 (four years before the appearance of Darwin's "Origin of Species") he published his "Principles of Psychology," which is based on the principle of evolution. In 1860 he issued a prospectus of his "System of Synthetic Philosophy," in which, beginning with the first principles of knowledge, he proposed to trace the progress of evolution in life, mind, society, and morality. His works include "Social Statics, or the Conditions Essential to Human Happiness Specified, etc." (1850), "Over-Legislation" (1854), "The Principles of Psychology" (1855), "Part I: The Data of Psychology" (1869: an enlarged edition of these two was published later (1870-72); see below), "Essays" (1857-63-64-74), "Education: Intellectual, Moral, and Physical" (1861), "Classification of the Sciences" (1864), "Illustrations of Universal Progress" (1864), "The Study of Sociology" (1873), "Descriptive Sociology" (1874-82; compiled under his direction by James Collier, D. Duncaan, and Richard Sheppig), "Progress: Its Law and Course" (1881), "The Philosophy of Style" (1882), "The Man versus the State" (1884), "The Factors of Organic Evolution" (reprinted in 1887 from the "Nineteenth Century"), etc. The series announced in 1860 under the general title "A System of Synthetic Philosophy" was published as follows: Vol. I, "First Principles" (1862); Vols. II, III, "The Principles of Biology" (1863 and 1867); Vols. IV, V, "The Principles of Psychology" (1870-72); Vols. VI, VII, VIII, "The Principles of Sociology" (1877); vol. I of these includes "The Data of Sociology," "The Inductions of Sociology," and "The Domestic Relations"; vol. II includes "Cerebral Institutions" (1879), "Political Institutions" (1882), and "Ecclesiastical Institutions" (1888); vol. III was published in 1897; Vols. IX, X, "The Principles of Morality or of Ethics" (vol. I of these includes "The Data of Ethics" (1879), "Induction of Ethics" (1892), and "Ethics of Individual Life" (1892), and vol. II contains "Justice" (1891) and "Negative Beneficence and Positive Beneficence" (1893)).

Spencer, Robert, second Earl of Sunderland. Born 1640; died at Althorp, Northamptonshire, Sept. 28, 1702. An English politician. He succeeded to the earldom in 1643; served as ambassador at several courts under Charles II.; was secretary of state 1679-81; became secretary again about 1682; and continued in office under James II. He was made lord chamberlain and lord justice by William III., whom he was said to have rendered important services before his accession. He retired to private life in 1697.

Spencer, John Charles, third Earl Spencer: known as Viscount Althorp previous to his accession to the earldom. Born at London, May 20, 1782; died at Wiseton Hall, Nottinghamshire, Oct. 1, 1845. An English statesman, son of the second Earl Spencer; leader of the Whig opposition in the House of Commons under George IV. He was chancellor of the exchequer and leader of the House of Commons 1830-34, and was largely instrumental in procuring the passage of the Reform Bill. He became Earl Spencer in 1834.

Spencer, John Poyntz, fifth Earl Spencer. Born Oct. 27, 1835. An English statesman, nephew of the third Earl Spencer. He was lord lieutenant of Ireland 1868-74, 1882-85; president of the council 1880-82, 1886; and first lord of the admiralty 1892-95.

Spencer, William Robert. Born about 1769; died at Paris, 1834. An English poet. He was educated at Harrow and Oxford. He spent the last ten years of his life in Paris. His principal poems are vers de société and ballads, among the latter that of "Beth Gelert, or the Grave of the Grey-Hound."

Spener (spā'ner), Philipp Jakob. Born at Rappoltsweiler, Alsace, Jan. 13, 1635; died at Berlin, Feb. 5, 1705. A German theologian: called "the Father of Pietism." He was pastor at Frankfurt 1666-68, and court chaplain in Dresden 1668-91, and later (1691) in Berlin. He wrote "Theologische Bedenken," etc.

Spenslow (spen'lō), Dora. The "child-wife" of David Copperfield, in Dickens's "David Copperfield."

Spennymoor (spen'ī-mōr). A town in Durham, England, 5 miles south of Durham. Population (1891), 6,041.

Spens (spens), Sir Patrick. The subject of a Scottish ballad: said to have been wrecked in the Orkneys.

Spenser (spen'sēr), Edmund. Born at London about 1552; died at London, Jan. 13, 1599. A celebrated English poet. He was educated at the Merchant Taylors' School, London, and at Pembroke College, Cambridge, 1569-76, where he associated with Gabriel Harvey, Edward Kirke, and other men of note. Afterward he became intimate with Sir Philip Sidney and Leicester, who did much for him. He was sent abroad by Leicester in 1579, and went in 1580 as secretary with Lord Grey de Wilton to Ireland, to assist in suppressing Desmond's rebellion, and became extremely unpopular. In the redistribution of Munster he became an undertaker for the settlement of about 3,000 acres of land, with Kicolman Castle, County Cork, attached (forfeited by the Desmonds), the government undertaking his security. In 1581 he was made a clerk of the Irish court of chancery, and in 1588 clerk to the council of Munster. In his "View of the State of Ireland" (written about 1596, but not published till 1633) Spenser advocates the most oppressive measures, little short of wholesale depopulation. At the suggestion of Sir Walter Raleigh, whom he met at the Fort del Ore in 1580, he returned to London in 1589 with the first three books of the "Faerie Queene," which were entered at Stationers' Hall, Dec., 1589, and published in 1590. In 1591 he returned, already famous, to Kicolman Castle, and wrote "Colin Clout's Come Home Again" (published in 1595). His house was burned by the Irish rebels in 1598, and he fled with his family to Cork, and then went to London, where about four weeks later he died. His first poems were published in a small volume entitled "The Theatre for Worldlings" (1569), said to have been translations from Belay and Petrarch, but this has been disputed. He also wrote "The Shepherd's Calendar" (1579), "The Faerie Queene" (1590-96) (see these entries), "Daphnaida" (1591), "Complaints" (1591: including "Tears of the Muses," "Mother Hubbard's Tale," etc.), "Epithalamion" and "Amoretti" (1595), "Astrophel," "Prothalamion," "Four Hymns" (1596), etc.

Speransky, or Speranski (spā-rān'skē), Count Mikhail. Born in the government of Vladimir, Jan. 1, 1772; died at St. Petersburg, Feb. 11, 1839. A Russian statesman. He became state secretary in 1801, colleague of the minister of justice in 1808, and secretary of the empire in 1809. He was in banishment 1812-16. From 1819 to 1821 he was governor-general of Siberia. He directed the compilation of the Russian laws.

Spey (spā). A river in Scotland which rises in Inverness, forms part of the boundary between Elgin and Banff, and flows into the North Sea 8 miles east-northeast of Elgin. It has valuable salmon-fisheries. Length, about 100 miles.

Speyer, or Speier (spi'er or spīr), E. Spires (spīrz), F. Spire (spēr). [L. Spira.] The capital of the Rhine Palatinate, Bavaria, situated at the junction of the Speyerbach and Rhine, in lat. 49° 19' N., long. 8° 26' E. Its cathedral is a Romanesque structure, founded in 1030 and completed in 1061, and still, despite fires and restorations, retaining in great part its original form. The three portals of the west end open into a narthex called the Kaiser-Halle, from which one great recessed and sculptured door leads into the nave. Over the west end rise two bold square towers. The transepts are at the east end, immediately in front of the semicircular apse, and the crossing is covered with a fine dome. The church is surrounded with open arcading beneath the roof. The interior produces a striking effect of great size; it is adorned with excellent modern frescos of Old and New Testament subjects, and other art works medieval and modern. The interesting crypt is wholly of the early 11th century. The dimensions are 440 by 125 feet; length of transepts, 180; height of vaulting, 105; width of nave, 45. Speyer is the Roman Novionagus Nemetum. It became the seat of a bishopric about 610 A. D.; became a free imperial city 1294; and was long the seat of the imperial chamber. It was burned by the French in 1089. The chief diets of Speyer were those of 1526 and 1529; the latter condemned the Reformation, and the "Protestation" then made by the Reformers gave rise to the name "Protestant." Population (1890), 17,583.

Speyerbach (spî'er-bäch). A small river which joins the Rhine at Speyer. On its banks, Nov. 15, 1703, the French (18,000) under Tallard defeated a German army (12,000) under the Count of Nassau-Weilburg.

Spezia, or Spetzia (spet'se-ä). A seaport in the province of Genoa, Italy, situated on the Gulf of Spezia, in lat. (of lighthouse) 44° 4' N., long. 9° 51' E.; the ancient Pityussa or Haliussa (?). It is one of the chief Italian naval stations, has the largest and best harbor in Italy, and has a marine arsenal, docks, and extensive ship-building works. It is near the site of the ancient Roman Luna. Population, 19,864.

Spezia, Gulf of. A small arm of the Mediterranean, near Spezia.

Spezia, or Spetzia (spet'se-ä). 1. An island belonging to Argolis, Greece, situated at the entrance to the Gulf of Nauplia, 28 miles southeast of Nauplia. Length, 5 miles.—2. A seaport on the island of Spezia.

Sphacteria (sfak-tê'ri-ä). [Gr. Σφακτῆρια.] A small island near Navarino, off the coast of Messenia, Greece; the modern Sphagia. Here, 425 B. C., the Spartans were blockaded by the Athenians, and were compelled by Cleon to surrender.

Spheres of Influence. Large areas of land in Africa recognized as under the control of European powers. The phrase came into use about 1885. It designates the region which may be occupied and developed by the power for which it is named. The European spheres of influence in Africa comprise a large part of the continent. See East Africa (British, German, Portuguese), German Southwest Africa, and Kongo, French.

Sphinx, Temple of the. A structure (incorrectly called a temple) lying a short distance southeast of the Sphinx at Gizeh. It is in fact a family mausoleum of Khafra or Chephen, the builder of the Second Pyramid, and is connected with the Temple of the Second Pyramid by a rock-cut passage. Here was found the colossal statue of Khafra now in the Gizeh Museum. The temple is built of splendid blocks of red granite and alabaster. It consists of a passage descending to an open three-aisled area with square piers and lintels, and two cross-passages or transepts toward the east. At the end of the first transept there is a burial-chamber with 6 niches for mummies, in two tiers, and similar chambers open from the entrance passage.

Sphinx (sfings), The. A celebrated figure at Gizeh, Egypt, about a quarter of a mile southeast of the Great Pyramid. According to present archaeological opinion, it is older than the Gizeh pyramids. It consists of an enormous figure of a crouching sphinx of the usual Egyptian type, hewn from the natural rock, with the flanks and cavities filled in with masonry. The body is 140 feet long; the head measures about 30 feet from the top of the forehead to the chin, and is 14 wide. Except the head and shoulders, the figure has for ages generally been buried in the desert sand. The face, despite the mutilation of eyes and nose due to Mohammedan fanaticism, impresses by its calm dignity. The low head-dress extends broadly outward on each side. A long rock-cut passage composed of inclined plane and steps leads down in front to the extended fore paws of the Sphinx, which are 50 feet long and cased with masonry. Between the paws were found an altar, a crouching lion with fragments of others, and 3 large inscribed tablets, one, 14 feet high, against the Sphinx's breast, and the two others extending from it on each side, thus forming a sort of shrine. The Sphinx was a local personification of the sun-god. No interior chamber has been discovered.

To this day, the most ancient statue known is a colossus—namely, the Great Sphinx of Gizeh. It was already in existence in the time of Khoofoo (Cheops), and perhaps we should not be far wrong if we ventured to ascribe it to the generations before Mena, called in the priestly chronicles "the Servants of Horus." Hewn in the living rock at the extreme verge of the Libyan plateau, it seems, as the representative of Horus, to open its head in order to be the first to catch sight of his father, Ra, the rising sun, across the valley. For centuries the sands have buried it to the chin, yet without protecting it from ruin. Its battered body preserves but the general form of a lion's body. The paws and breast, restored by the Ptolemies and the Cæsars, retain but a part of the stone facing with which they were then clothed in order to mask the ravages of time. The lower part of the head-dress has fallen, and the diminished neck looks too slender to sustain the enormous weight of the head. The nose and beard have been broken off by fanatics, and the red hue which formerly enlivened the features is almost wholly effaced. And yet, notwithstanding its fallen fortunes, the monster preserves an expression of sovereign strength and greatness. The eyes gaze outward with a look of intense and profound thoughtfulness; the mouth still wears a smile; the whole countenance is informed with power and repose.

Maspero, Egypt. Archæol., p. 201.

He captured Ostend in 1604; commanded in the Netherlands against Maurice of Nassau until the peace of 1609; conquered the Palatinate in 1620; besieged and took Breda in 1625; and later commanded in Italy.

Spinoza (spi-nö'zä), Baruch (or Benedict). Born at Amsterdam, Nov. 24, 1632; died at The Hague, Feb. 21, 1677. A famous philosopher, the greatest modern expounder of pantheism. His parents were members of a community of Jews who had emigrated from Portugal and Spain. In 1656 he was condemned by the Jewish congregation of Amsterdam as a heretic, and excommunicated. From this time on he supported himself by grinding lenses, an art in which he was very proficient. He lived with a friend (a Remonstrant) just outside of Amsterdam until about the beginning of 1661, when they removed to the village of Rhynsburg, near Leyden. In 1663 he went to Voorburg, a suburb of The Hague, and in 1670 took up his residence in The Hague itself. An attempt upon his life was made at Amsterdam in 1656. He was a student of the philosophy of Descartes, and his metaphysical speculations have the Cartesian philosophy as their point of departure. He wrote "Tractatus theologico-politicus" (1670), a practical political treatise designed to demonstrate the necessity in a free commonwealth of freedom of thought and speech; "Ethica ordine geometrico demonstrata" (completed in 1674, but published posthumously); "Ethica Demonstrata in the Geometrical Order"; his most famous work, and the one containing his metaphysical system; "De Intellectus emendatione"; and a small treatise on the rainbow (published in 1687; supposed to be lost, but discovered by Van Vloten and reprinted 18-2-83).

Spiritual Quixote, The. A novel by the Rev. Richard Graves, published in 1772. It was intended to ridicule the illiterate and fanatical among the Methodists.

The hero . . . is Geoffrey Wildgoose, a young man of a respectable family and small estate, who, having picked up some old volumes of Pufendorfian divinity, such as "Crumbs of Comfort," "Honeycombs for the Elect," the "Marrow of Divinity," the "Spiritual Eye Salve and Cordials for the Saints," and a book of Baxter with an unmentionable name, resolves to sally forth and convert his benighted fellow-countrymen in the highways and by-ways of England. He is accompanied by Jeremiah Tugwell, a collier, who acts as a sort of Sancho Panza; and they visit Gloucester, Bath, and Bristol, where they are involved in various adventures more creditable to the zeal of Wildgoose than to his discretion.

Stäel-Holstein (stā'el-hol'stīn; F. pron. stā'el-stā'n'), Anne Louise Germaine Necker, Baronne de: commonly called Madame de Staël. Born at Paris, April 22, 1766; died there, July 14, 1817. A celebrated French writer. She was the daughter of Necker, the minister of finance under Louis XVI. Already as a child she enjoyed in her own home the society of men like Buffon, Marmontel, Grimm, and Gibbon, who were all personal friends of her father, and who stimulated her to mental activity. She especially admired J. J. Rousseau, and devoted to him her first serious essay, "Lettres sur le caractère et les écrits de J. J. Rousseau" (1788). In 1786 she was married to the Baron de Staël-Holstein, ambassador from Sweden to France: he died in 1802. Madame de Staël spent a couple of years in Germany (1803-04), and met both Goethe and Schiller at Weimar. In 1805 she took a short trip to Italy. In 1800 she published one of her best works, "De la littérature considérée dans ses rapports avec les institutions sociales." In 1802 appeared her novel "Delphine," and in 1807 "Corinne." She returned to Germany in 1808 to finish "De l'Allemagne," her best-known work. The first edition (Paris, 1810) was destroyed, presumably at the instigation of Napoleon, who at all times evinced a spirit of petty enmity toward the great writer. He was furthermore the cause of her exile from France (1812-14), when she visited Austria, Russia, Sweden, and England. She also wrote "Considérations sur la révolution française" (1818). Other posthumous works by her are "Dix années d'exil" and "Essais dramatiques" (1821), and finally her "Œuvres inédites" (1836).

Stamp Act. An act imposing or regulating the imposition of stamp duties; in American colonial history, an act, also known as Grenville's Stamp Act, passed by the British Parliament in 1765, providing for the raising of revenue in the American colonies by the sale of stamps and stamped paper for commercial transactions, real-estate transfers, lawsuits, marriage licenses, inheritances, etc.; it also provided that the royal forces in America should be billeted on the people. The act was to go into effect Nov. 1, 1765; but it aroused intense opposition, led by the assembly of Virginia, Massachusetts, and other colonies. A "Stamp Act Congress," with delegates from many of the colonies, met at New York in Oct., 1765, and a petition against this and other repressive measures was sent to England. The Stamp Act was repealed in March, 1766, but the agitation was one of the leading causes in effecting the Revolution.

Stanhope (stan'ōp), Charles, third Earl Stanhope. Born Aug. 3, 1753; died at Chevening, Kent, Dec. 15, 1816. An English statesman and scientist. He was educated at Eton and Geneva. From 1780 to 1786, when he succeeded to the earldom, he was member of Parliament for Wycombe, Buckinghamshire, and was a supporter of Pitt, whose sister he married Dec. 19, 1774. In the arbitrary measures of his later career Lord Stanhope opposed his brother-in-law. He was chairman of the "Revolutionary Society," formed in commemoration of the revolution of 1688, which sympathized with the French Revolution; and in 1795 introduced a motion in the House of Lords deprecating interference with French affairs. He was left in a "minority of one," a sobriquet which clung to him, and left Parliament for five years. He was caricatured by Sayers and Gillray. On March 17, 1781, he married as his second wife a niece of the first Earl Temple and George Grenville. Lady Hester Stanhope was a daughter of his first wife. He invented the Stanhope printing-press and lens, improved canal-locks, and (1793-97) made experiments in steam navigation. He published "Principles of Electricity" (1779) and a reply to Burke's "Reflections on the Revolution in France" (1790).

Stanhope, Lady Hester Lucy. Born at London, March 12, 1776; died at Djoun in Mount Lebanon, June 23, 1839. Daughter of the third Earl Stanhope, and niece of William Pitt, and from 1803 the head of Pitt's household and his private secretary. She attended his death-bed. In Feb., 1810, she left England and established a small satrapy at Djoun in Mount Lebanon. In 1832 Ibrahim Pasha, when about to invade Syria, was obliged to secure her neutrality. Her "Memoirs, as Related by Herself in Conversations with her Physician" (Dr. Meryon), were published in 1846, and later (1846) the "Memoirs" were supplemented by her "Travels."

Stanhope, James, first Earl Stanhope. Born at Paris, 1673; died at London, Feb. 5, 1721. An English general and politician, nephew of the second Earl of Chesterfield. He resided in Spain, where his father was minister; entered the army in 1694; was member of Parliament in 1702; served as brigadier-general at the siege of Barcelona in 1705; was commander-in-chief in Spain in 1708, when he captured Port Mahon; with Starbemberg defeated the Spaniards at Almenara July 17, 1710, and at Saragosa Aug. 20; and surrendered at Brihuega (1710). On the accession of George I. (1714) he was appointed secretary of state; in 1717 was first lord of the treasury and chancellor of the exchequer; and in April, 1718, was created Earl Stanhope.

Stanhope, Philip Dormer, fourth Earl of Chesterfield. Born at London, Sept. 22, 1694; died March 24, 1773. An English politician, orator, and writer: famous as a man of fashion. He was a graduate of Trinity Hall, Cambridge; occupied a number of diplomatic positions; and was lord lieutenant of Ireland 1744-46. His chief work is "Letters to his Son," which were not written for publication, but were published in 1774. These letters give instruction in manners and morals, and the method of "uniting wickedness and the graces," written by the man who of all others in England desired to be considered the mirror of politeness. It was to Chesterfield that Johnson wrote his celebrated invective about the dictionary in 1755, which is now thought to be unjust.

Stanhope, Philip Henry, fifth Earl Stanhope, designated by the courtesy title Lord Mahon before his accession to the earldom. Born Jan. 31, 1805; died at Bournemouth, Dec. 24, 1875. An English historian and politician, grandson of the third Earl Stanhope. He wrote a "History of England from the Peace of Utrecht to the Peace of Versailles" (1836-54); "The War of Succession in Spain" (1832); lives of Belisarius, Condé, Joan of Arc, and William Pitt; and a "History of England, comprising the Reign of Anne until the Peace of Utrecht" (1870).

Star Chamber (stär chäm'bër). [So called, it is said, because the roof was orig. ornamented with stars; perhaps from Heb. shitar, a contract, the name of the financial documents executed between the exchequer of the Jews (who farmed the British revenues) and the early kings of England.] In English history, a court of civil and criminal jurisdiction at Westminster. It was constituted in view of offenses and controversies most frequent at the royal court, or affecting the interests of the crown, such as maintenance, fraud, libel, conspiracy, or riots resulting from faction or oppression, and administered justice by arbitrary authority instead of according to the common law. Such a jurisdiction was exercised at least as early as the reign of Henry VI., the tribunal then consisting of the privy council. A statute of Henry VII. authorized a committee of the council to exercise such a jurisdiction, and this tribunal grew in power (although successive statutes from the time of Edward IV. were enacted to restrain it) until it fell into disuse in the latter part of the reign of Henry VIII. In 21 Henry VIII., a statute declared that the king's proclamation should have the force of law, and that offenders might be punished by the ordinary members of the council sitting with certain bishops and judges "in the Sterr Chamber at Westminster or elsewhere." In 1640 the court of Star Chamber was abolished by an act of 16 Charles I., reciting that "the reasons and motives inducing the erection and continuance of that court [of Star Chamber] do now cease."

Stobæus (stô-bé'us), Joannes. Born at Stobi, Macedonia; lived probably about the 5th century A. D. A Greek writer, author of an anthology.

Among the Byzantine writers to whom we are indebted for precious relics of the older Greek authors, perhaps the earliest, and certainly not the least important, is John of Stobi in Macedonia, generally known as Stobæus. His personal existence has vanished from all records, and even his date is determined rather by inference than by testimony. He mentions Hierocles, who flourished about the middle of the 5th century, and does not name any subsequent writer. It is therefore concluded that he lived soon after that author.

Stoics (stô'iks). [Formerly also Stoicks; F. stoïque, Sp. estóico, Pg. estoico, It. stoico, from L. stoicus, from Gr. στωικός, pertaining to a porch or portico, specifically pertaining to that called Ἰεῶν Πόρτις, 'the Painted Porch' in the Agora at Athens, and to the school of philosophy founded by Zeno, who frequented this porch.] Disciples of the philosopher Zeno, who founded a sect about 308 B. C. He taught that men should be free from passion, unmoved by joy or grief, and submit without complaint to the unavoidable necessity by which all things are governed. The Stoics are proverbially known for the sternness and austerity of their doctrines, and for the influence which their tenets exercised over some of the noblest spirits of antiquity, especially among the Romans. Their system appears to have been an attempt to reconcile a theological pantheism and a materialist psychology with a logic which seeks the foundations of knowledge in the representations or perceptions of the senses, and a morality which claims as its first principle the absolute freedom of the human will. The Stoics teach that whatever is real is material; that matter and force are the two ultimate principles; and that matter is of itself motionless and unformed, though capable of receiving all motions and all forms. Force is the active, moving, and molding principle, and is inseparably joined with matter; the working force in the universe is God, whose existence as a wise, thinking being is proved by the beauty and adaptation of the world. The supreme end of life, or the highest good, is virtue—that is, a life conformed to nature, the agreement of human conduct with the all-controlling law of nature, or of the human with the divine will; not contemplation, but action, is the supreme problem for man; virtue is sufficient for happiness, but happiness or pleasure should never be made the end of human endeavor. The wise man alone attains to the complete performance of his duty; he is without passion, although not without feeling; he is not indulgent but just toward himself and others; he alone is free; he is king and lord, and is inferior in inner worth to no other rational being, not even to Zeus himself.

Stonehenge (stōn'henj). A celebrated prehistoric monument in Salisbury Plain, Wiltshire, England, 8 miles north of Salisbury. The original plan seems to have included two concentric circles of upright stones inclosing two ellipses. In the middle there is a slab called the altar. Seventeen stones of the outer circle (16-18 feet high) are standing, in part connected by lintel-slabs resting on their tops. In the vicinity are many barrows and a race-course ("cursus").

We cannot leave this point without alluding to the question, whose temple Stonehenge was, or whose it chiefly was. After giving it all the attention I can, I have come to the conclusion that we cannot do better than follow the story of Geoffrey, which makes Stonehenge the work of Merlin Emrys, commanded by another Emrys, which I interpret to mean that the temple belonged to the Celtic Zeus, whose later legendary self we have in Merlin. It would be in vain to look for any direct argument for or against such an hypothesis: one can only say that it suits the facts of the case, and helps to understand others of a somewhat similar nature. What sort of a temple could have been more appropriate for the primary god of light and of the luminous heavens than a spacious, open-air enclosure of a circular form like Stonehenge? Nor do I see any objection to the old idea that Stonehenge was the original of the famous temple of Apollo in the island of the Hyperboreans, the stories about which were based in the first instance most likely on the journal of Pytheas' travels. Rhys, Celtic Heathendom, p. 194.

He published "Sonetti, strambotti, epistole e capitole" (1508), but is best remembered by his collection of stories called "Tredici piacevoli notti," drawn from many sources and published at Venice in two series in 1550 and 1554. Many editions were issued, and the book has been a storehouse from which succeeding writers have obtained plots, etc. Shakespeare and Molière are indebted to it, one of the stories is in Painter's "Palace of Penance," and there have been several French translations. The stories are told on separate nights by a party of ladies and gentlemen enjoying the cool air at Murano (Venice), and are frequently called "Straparola's Nights."

Strasbourg (stras'börg), G. Strassburg (strās'bör), F. Strassburg (strās-bör'). The capital of Alsace-Lorraine, situated at the junction of the Breusch and Ill, about 2 miles from the Rhine, in lat. 48° 35' N., long. 7° 46' E.; the Roman Argentoratum. It is a railway center, a fortress of the first rank, and an important strategic point. It has manufactures of beer, leather, tobacco, dyes, etc.; and exports beer, sausages, "fat liver pies," sauer-kraut, hops, etc. The cathedral is an interesting monument, founded in the 11th century, and not finished until the 15th. The west front and openwork tower and spire are famous: the front is very richly decorated with tracery windows and slender areading, and has fine sculptured portals and a splendid rose, but it bears little relation to the remainder of the edifice, far above which it rises in a heavy square mass. The spire is 468 feet high. The 13th-century nave is 100 feet high, and excellent in design; the east end is of massive Romanesque, with an early crypt. The medieval glass is gorgeous in color, and the great astronomical clock (1812) is an artistic and scientific curiosity. The Church of St. Thomas is chiefly of the time of transition from Romanesque to Pointed, of massive and imposing architecture, and possesses good glass. It is chiefly remarkable, however, for the tomb of the Maréchal de Saxe, erected by Louis XV., and designed by Pigalle. The marshal appears descending to the grave, to which he is conducted by Death, while France in the form of a beautiful woman seeks to hold him back. The University of Strasbourg was founded in the first part of the 17th century; was suppressed in the French Revolution; was refounded later as a French academy; and was refounded as a university in 1872. Connected with it are an observatory and a library of over 700,000 volumes. Near Argentoratum the emperor Julian defeated the Alamanni in 357; but the town was later conquered by the Alamanni and by the Franks. Strasbourg was confirmed as a free imperial city in consequence of the victory of the citizens over the bishop in 1262. The guilds obtained a share in the government in 1332. A wholesale execution of Jews took place in 1349. The town became one of the leading cities of the Empire; accepted the Reformation; was taken by the French in 1651 and confirmed to them in 1697; and was annexed with Alsace to Germany in 1871. The city was invested by the Germans in the middle of Aug., 1870; was bombarded Aug. 24 and succeeding days; and capitulated (after great damage to the city and cathedral) Sept. 28, with a garrison of nearly 18,000 men commanded by General Urich. The attacking force was under General von Werder. Population (1900), 150,268.

Strasburg. A village in Shenandoah County, Virginia, situated on the North Fork of the Shenandoah, 72 miles west of Washington. It was an important point in the Civil War. Near it occurred the battle of Fisher's Hill, or Woodstock, Sept. 22, 1864.

Strasburg, Oath of. See the extract.

This fact comes prominently forth in the famous oath of Strasburg, preserved by Nithard. That precious document has been commented upon over and over again as a matter of philology; it is no less valuable as a matter of history. It shows that in 841 the distinctions of race and language were beginning to make themselves felt. The Austrasian soldiers of King Lewis swear in the Old-German tongue, of which the oath is an early monument; but of the language in which the oath is taken by the Neustrian soldiers of King Charles, the oath itself is, as far as our knowledge goes, absolutely the oldest monument.

Freeman, Hist. Essays, 1. 181.

Strauss (strous), David Friedrich. Born at Ludwigsburg, Württemberg, Jan. 27, 1808; died at Ludwigsburg, Feb. 8, 1874. A celebrated German theological and philosophical writer and biographer. He was educated at Tübingen and Berlin, and was "repetent" at the Theological Seminary and lecturer at the University of Tübingen 1832-35. He was deprived of his office on account of his "Leben Jesu," and received the position of teacher at the Lyceum of Ludwigsburg; this, however, he abandoned in 1836, and went to Stuttgart. In 1839 he was called as professor of dogmatics and church history to Zurich; but his appointment caused so much opposition that he was at once pensioned, and soon driven from the place. He lived thereafter at Stuttgart, Darmstadt, and elsewhere. He sought to prove that the gospel history is mythical in character. Among his works are "Das Leben Jesu" ("Life of Jesus," 1835), "Die christliche Glaubenslehre, etc." ("Christian Doctrine of Belief," 1840-41), biographies of Schubart (1849), Märklin (1851), Frischlin (1855), Ulrich von Hutten (1855-60), Renardus (1862), Voltaire (1870), "Das Leben Jesu für das deutsche Volk" (1864), "Der alte und der neue Glaube" ("The Old and the New Belief," 1872), and controversial works.

Stuart, or Stewart, or Steuart (stū'ärt). A royal family of Scotland and England. It was descended from a family which for several generations held the office of high steward of Scotland (whence the name). Walter, the sixth high steward, married Margaret, daughter of Robert Bruce, and on the death of Margaret's brother David II. in 1371, the only child of this marriage succeeded as Robert II. The Stuart sovereigns of Scotland were Robert II., Robert III., James I., James II., James III., James IV., James V., Mary Queen of Scots, and James VI. James IV. married Margaret, daughter of Henry VII. of England, and on the failure of direct heirs at the death of Elizabeth, the last of Henry VIII.'s descendants, in 1603, James VI. of Scotland, Margaret's great-grandson, succeeded to the throne of England as James I. The Stuart sovereigns of England and Scotland jointly were James I., Charles I., Charles II., James II., Mary (consort of William III.), and Anne.

Stuart (stü'ärt). Arabella. Born about 1575; died in the Tower of London, Sept. 27, 1615. A daughter of Charles Stuart, earl of Lennox (younger brother of Darnley), and cousin of James I. She was the next heir after James to both the English and Scottish crowns. "Lady Margaret Douglas, the mother of Darnley and his brother, having been the daughter of Archibald, sixth earl of Angus, by Margaret, queen dowager of James IV., James V. (I. of England) was thus nearest heir of the junior English branch by a double descent, Arabella Stuart being next heir by a single descent." (Encyc. Brit.) Sir Walter Raleigh was accused of a plot to place her on the throne in 1603. She married William Seymour in 1610, and was imprisoned by James in consequence.

Stuart, Charles Edward. See Charles Edward Louis Philip Casimir.

Stuart, Gilbert. Born at Narragansett, R. I., 1755; died at Boston, July 27, 1828. A noted American portrait-painter. He was a pupil of West in London, and settled in the United States in 1793. He painted five whole-lengths and a number of other portraits of Washington, and also portraits of John Adams, J. Q. Adams, Jefferson, Madison, Story, Ames, Astor, etc. Of his portraits of Washington the so-called "Athenæum head," and its pendant the portrait of Mrs. Washington, were painted at Germantown, and were bought from Stuart's widow by the Washington Association and other gentlemen, who presented them to the Boston Athenæum in 1831. Stuart copied them for General Washington, according to the statement of his daughter, keeping the originals by agreement. The "Gibbs Washington" is also in the same institution. Excellent specimens of his work are to be found in the Boston Museum of Fine Arts and the New York Historical Society, the latter including the portrait of Egbert Benson, painted in 1807. His greatest works are the portraits of Judge Stephen Jones and of F. S. Richards of Boston. His best work in England is a portrait of Mr. Grant of Congalton skating, exhibited as a Gainsborough in 1878.

Styria (stir'i-ä). [G. Steiermark or Steyermark, F. Styrie.] A crownland and titular duchy of the Cisleithan division of Austria-Hungary, bounded by Upper Austria and Lower Austria on the north, Hungary on the east, Croatia and Carniola on the south, Carinthia on the south and west, and Salzburg on the west. Capital, Grätz. It is divided into Upper Styria in the north and Lower Styria in the south. The surface is generally mountainous (the Alps, including the Styrian Alps and the Karawanken), and is traversed by the Mur and Drave; the Save is on its southern frontier. It is rich in agricultural products, has great mineral wealth (iron and coal, lead, zinc, also salt, etc.) and has important manufactures of iron and iron and steel articles. The prevailing religion is Roman Catholic. About two thirds of the inhabitants are Germans, about one third Slovenes. Styria has 27 members in the Reichsrat, and a Landtag of 63 members. The ancient inhabitants were the Celtic Taurisci. The country was a part of ancient Noricum and Pannonia. The Wends settled in it in the 6th century. It was conquered by Charles the Great; was erected from a margravate into a duchy about 1180; was united with Austria in 1302; and has been in the possession of the Hapsburgs since 1282. It was several times invaded by the Styx (stiks). [Gr. Ἔρις, the hateful.] In Greek mythology, a daughter of Oceanus, and mother of Zeal, Victory, Power, and Strength. She first came to the aid of Zeus against the Titans, and as a reward he kept her children with him in Olympus, and made her the goddess by whom the most inviolable oaths were sworn. She was the goddess of the river Styx.

Styx. In Greek mythology, a mighty river, the tenth part of the water of Oceanus, which flows in the lower world. An oath sworn by any of the gods in the name of the river was confirmed by drinking a cup of its water brought by Iris. If such an oath was violated, the guilty party was punished by being deprived of speech and breath for a year and banished from the council of gods for nine years. The name was also given to a waterfall in Arcadia. See the extract.

Pausanias describes the terrible water as "a stream falling from a precipice, the highest that he had ever beheld, and dashing itself upon a lofty rock, through which it passed and then fell into the Crathis" (VIII. xviii. § 2). Homer and Hesiod give similar descriptions. Colonel Leake ("Morea," iii. p. 160) seems to have discovered the waterfall intended, near Solos, where "two slender cascades of water fall perpendicularly over an immense precipice, and, after winding for a time among a labyrinth of rocks, unite to form the torrent which, after passing the Klukines, joins the river Akrata" (Crathis). Superstitious feelings of dread still attach to the water, which is considered to be of a peculiarly noxious character. Rawlinton, Herod., III. 457, note.

Suckling (suk'ling), Sir John. Born at Whitton, Middlesex (baptized Feb. 10, 1609); supposed to have committed suicide at Paris about 1642. An English Royalist poet and man of fashion of the court of Charles I. His father was a comptroller of the household of Charles I. In 1623 he entered Trinity College, Cambridge, and 1631-32 fought in the Marquis of Hamilton's troop in Gustavus Adolphus's army. Returning to court just as the masks had passed their splendor, he wrote plays adapted to the scenery which the taste for them had developed. "Aglaura" was produced in 1637, and "Brennort" in 1639. When the war with the Scottish Covenanters began (1639), he raised a troop of 100 horse for the king. In Nov., 1640, he was elected member for Bramber in the Long Parliament. In May, 1641, he was implicated in a plot for the liberation of Strafford, was charged with high treason, and fled from England. He is best known from his lyric poems and ballads.

Sucre (sö'krä), Antonio José de. Born at Cumana, Venezuela, June 13, 1795; died in the province of Pasto, New Granada, June 4, 1830. A Spanish-American general in the war for independence. He was a trusted lieutenant of Bolívar, and during his absence gained two of the most decisive victories of the war—the battle of Pichincha (May 24, 1822), which freed Quito or Ecuador; and that of Ayacucho (Dec. 9, 1824), which put an end to Spanish rule in South America. Sucre was awarded the title of grand marshal of Ayacucho, and was elected first president of Bolivia Oct. 8, 1826. He resigned in Sept., 1829, to prevent a war with Peru, the government of that country having demanded his removal as an adherent of Bolívar. Sucre went to Colombia, where he took command of the army then acting against Peru, gained the battle of Giron, near Cuenca, Feb. 26, 1829, and thus practically ended the war. He was president of the Colombian congress of 1829, and while returning to his home in Quito was assassinated, at the instigation, as was supposed, of his political enemies.

Sucre, or Chuquisaca (chö-kö-sä'kä). The official capital of Bolivia, situated near lat. 19° 5' S. It contains cathedral and several educational institutions. Originally it was the Indian village of Chuquisaca. The Spaniards called it La Plata de Chuquisaca, or simply La Plata, from the important silver-mines of the vicinity. It was the capital of the old Spanish province of Charcas, whence it was also known as Charcas. The official name Sucre was given when it became the capital of Bolivia in 1826. For many years La Paz has been the seat of government. Population, about 19,000.

Suczawa (sö-chä'vä). A town in Bukowina, Austria-Hungary, situated on the river Suczawa 45 miles south by east of Czernowitz. Population (1890), commune, 10,221.

Sudan, or Soudan (sö-dän'), sometimes called Nigritia (nä-grish'ii). [Ar. Südan, the Blacks.]

A vast region in Africa, with indefinite boundaries, including the territories from the Atlantic (or Senegambia) eastward to Abyssinia or the Red Sea, and from the Sahara southward to the Guinea coast, and the Kongo Basin. The Eastern or Egyptian Sudan extends southward from the frontier of Egypt to Lake Albert Nyanza, eastward to the Red Sea and Abyssinia, and westward to Wadai. It includes Senaar, Khartum, Kordofan, Darfur, the Equatorial Province, and the Bahr-el-Ghazal province. Its area is about 950,000 square miles, and its population about 10,000,000. Of the central Sudan states Wadai, Baghirmi, and Kanem are within the French sphere of influence, and a part of Bornu, with Sokoto and Gando, within the British. Adauawa falls within the German Kamerun Hinterland. The boundaries between the English and the French possessions and spheres of influence both west and east of the Niger were determined by a convention between the United Kingdom and France ratified June 13, 1899.

Sudani (sö-dä'nē). A dialect of Arabic spoken in the Sudan.

Sudbury (sud'bu-ri). A town in Suffolk and Essex, England, situated on the Stour 50 miles northeast of London. Population (1891), 7,059.

Suderö (sö'de-rē). One of the Faroe Islands.

Sudeten (sö-de'ten). [G., 'Sudetie' Mountains.] A mountain system in Moravia, Austrian Silesia, Prussian Silesia, Bohemia, and Saxony. It extends from the basin of the Bečwa in Moravia to the gap of the Elbe near the Bohemian and Saxon frontier. Its chief divisions are the Isergebirge, Riesengebirge, Glatzer Mountains (Schneeberg), Reichensteiner Mountains, Eulengebirge, Adlberggebirge, Habelschwerter Mountains, Heuscheuergebirge, Schweidnitzer Mountains, Lansitzer Mountains, and the Moravian Gesenke and Altwater Schneegebirge.

Sudini. See Estii.

Sue (sü), Marie Joseph (best known as Eugène). Born at Paris, Dec. 10, 1804; died at Ancey, Savoy, July 3, 1857. A celebrated French novelist. His sponsors were Prince Eugène Beauharnais and the empress Josephine; from the former he took the name Eugène, which he prefixed to Sue to form his nom de plume. After a short stay at the Lycée Bonaparte in Paris, he took up painting and then medicine, and wrote also a couple of poor plays. He spent six years in the navy as a surgeon, falling heir to his father's large estate on his return to France in 1830. Chance led him to write his first novel, "Plick et Plock" (1831), and he was encouraged by its success to publish "Atar-Gull" (1831), "La salamandre" (1832), "La Coucaratcha" (1832-34), and "La vie de Koat-Ven" (1833). For the subject-matter of all these works he drew largely upon his store of personal reminiscences and experiences. A great deal of sound information on naval matters is found embodied in Sue's "Histoire de la marine française" (1835-37). Dropping gradually into the general style of novel, he published "Arthur" (1838), "Le marquis de Létorière" (1839), "Mathilde" (1841), "Le morne au diable" (1842). In a more crude strain he composed two historical novels, "La-treumont" (1837) and "Jean Cavalier" (1840). He exerted a profound influence by the views to which he gave expression in "Les mystères de Paris" (1842-43), and in "Le Juif errant" (1844-45). A change of government drove him into exile in 1852, and he spent the remainder of his life in Ancey. In addition to the works mentioned above, he wrote a few plays and a number of novels.

Suess (ziis), Eduard. Born at London, England, Aug. 20, 1831. A noted Austrian geologist. In 1857 he became professor of geology at the University of Vienna. He has been a member of the Landtag of Lower Austria since 1869, and in 1873 he entered the Reichsrath as deputy from Vienna, and was a member of the liberal party. He has held several public offices. He is noted for his special researches on the stratigraphy of the Alps, the geology of Italy, and the organization of the brachiopod mollusks. Among his works are "Der Boden der Stadt Wien" (1862), "Die Entstehung der Alpen" (1875), "Die Zukunft des Goldes" (1877), "Das Antlitz der Erde" (1885).

Suessiones (swes-i-ö'néz). An ancient people of Gallia Belgica, allied to and situated near the Remi, in the vicinity of Soissons (named from them). They were subjugated by Julius Cæsar 57 B. C.

Suessula (swes'ü-lä). In ancient geography, a place in Campania, Italy, 13 miles northeast of Naples; the traditional scene of a Roman victory over the Samnites in the first Samnite war.

Suetonius (swē-tó'ni-us) (Caius Suetonius Tranquillus). Lived in the first part of the 2d century A. D. A Roman biographer and historian. He was private secretary of Hadrian about 119-121, and was a friend of the younger Pliny, whom he accompanied to Bithynia in 112. His chief work is "Lives of the Cæsars," which contains biographies (of an anecdotal character) of the first twelve Cæsars, including Julius. It is important on account of its revelations concerning the private life of the emperors. Fragments of his "De grammaticis," and of other works, are extant.

Suett (sü'et), Richard. Died in 1805. An English comedian, known as Dickey Suett.

Suevi (swē'vi). [L. (Cæsar) Suebi. (Pliny) Suevi, Gr. (Strabo) Σύνδοι, (Jordanes) Σοῦδοι.] The collective name of a German people mentioned by Cæsar, who describes them as the largest and most warlike of the German tribes. At the time of Tacitus the Suevi occupied all central Germany west of the Oder, from the boundaries of the Harudes, who alone intervened between them and the Baltic, to the Danube. The common name included the Semnones, Chatti, Hermunduri, Marcomanni, Quadi, and Juthungi, with many of which tribal appellations the common name interchanged. In the first half of the 5th century the Suevi, so called (possibly the Juthungi), appeared as neighbors and allies of the Alamanni, with whom they acted as one folk; either name may be used of the whole people. Together they were crushingly defeated by the Franks under Clovis. Subsequently the Suevi were settled about the head waters of the Danube, where their name is still preserved in Swabia (Schwaben). The Suevi who settled in Spanish Galicia in the 5th century were possibly the Semnones.

Suevicum (swé'vi-kum), Mare. [L. 'Suevic Sea.] A Roman name of the Baltic Sea.

Suez (sö'ez or sö-éz'). A seaport of Egypt, situated at the head of the Gulf of Suez, and at the southern terminus of the Suez Canal, in lat. 29° 58' N., long. 32° 33' E.: the ancient Arsinoë, later Clysmia and Kolzum. It was the terminus of an ancient canal. It was developed in recent times by the opening of the fresh-water canal (1863), which extended from Suez to Ismailia, and of the Suez Canal in 1869. It has harbors and quays. Population (1897), 17,173.

Suez, Gulf of. The northwestern arm of the Red Sea, bounding the Sinaiic peninsula on the west: the ancient Heroopolis Siuis.

Suez, Isthmus of. The isthmus which unites Asia and Africa, and separates the Mediterranean from the Red Sea: now intersected by the Suez Canal (which see).

Suez Canal. A ship-canal which connects the Mediterranean with the Red Sea. Napoleon I. entertained the idea of building a maritime canal between these two bodies of water, but abandoned it in consequence of a report by the engineer Lepère (1798), which placed the surface of the Red Sea nearly 30 feet higher than that of the Mediterranean. This mistake was corrected by British officers in 1841, and in 1849 Ferdinand de Lesseps began a thorough investigation of the isthmus. With the consent of the Khedive of Egypt and the Porte he organized the Universal Company of the Maritime Suez Canal in 1856, half the capital of which was raised by public subscription in Europe (chiefly in France), the other half by the khedive. Work began April 25, 1859, and Nov. 16, 1869, the canal was opened for navigation, having cost about £20,000,000. It is 100 miles long, traversing Lake Menzalah, Lake Timisah, and the Bitter Lakes, and was originally from 150 to 300 feet wide at the water-surface, and 72 at the bottom, with a minimum depth of 26 feet; but has since (1886-90) been deepened to 28 feet and considerably widened. The original capital of the company consisted of 400,000 shares of £20 each (besides 100,000 founders' shares), of which 176,602 belonged to the khedive and were purchased by the British government in 1875. The following table shows the increase in the number of vessels passing through the canal and the receipts of the company:

Year	No. of vessels	Tonnage	Receipts
1870	486	654,915	£ 206,373
1880	2,026	4,344,519	1,629,577
1890	3,389	9,749,129	2,680,436
1894	3,752	11,288,855	2,951,073
1895	3,434	11,833,637	3,124,149
1896	3,409	12,039,859	3,182,500
1897	2,986	11,123,403	2,913,222
1898	3,503	12,962,632	3,411,791
1899	3,607	13,815,992	3,652,751

Suffolk (suf'ok). [ME. Suffolk, AS. Súthfole, south folk; opposed to Northfole, north folk, Norfolk.] The easternmost county of England, bounded by Norfolk, the North Sea, Essex, and Cambridge. Its surface is generally level, and it is one of the chief agricultural counties of England. It formed part of the old kingdom of East Anglia. Area, 1,475 square miles. Population (1891), 371,235.

Suffolk, Dukes of. See Brandon, Charles, and Grey, Henry.

Suffren de Saint-Tropez (su-frañ' dè san-trô-pä'), Pierre André de. Born at Saint-Cannat, France, July 13, 1726; died at Paris, Dec. 8, 1785. A French vice-admiral. He entered the French navy in 1743; was twice captured by the English; and was made captain in 1772. For ten years he was in the service of Malta. In 1781 he was sent to protect French interests in the East Indies. After an action at the Cape Verd Islands (April 16, 1781) he outalled Commodore Johnstone to the Cape of Good-Hope, and so prevented an attack of the English upon Cape Town. He fought five hard but indecisive battles against the English under Admiral Hughes: off Sadras (Feb. 17, 1782), off Trincomalee (April 12 and Sept. 3, 1782), off Negapatnam (July 6, 1782), off Cuddalore (June 20, 1783). He was recalled to France by the treaty of Versailles, and was received with the highest honors and created a vice-admiral.

Sufis (sü'fiz), or Safis, or Safawis. A dynasty of Persian monarchs who reigned from about 1501 to the accession of Nadir Shah in 1736.

Sugambri (sü-gam'brí), also Sigambri (si-gam'brí) or Sicambri (si-kam'brí). [L. (Cæsar) Sigambri, (Tacitus) Sugambri, Gr. (Strabo) Σοῦγαμβροί.] A German tribe, first mentioned by Cæsar, in whose time they were situated on the right bank of the lower Rhine, north of the Ubii, on both sides of the Ruhr.

Sugden (sug'den), Edward Burtenshaw, first Baron Saint Leonards. Born at London, Feb., 1781; died at Thames Dellon, Jan. 29, 1875. An English statesman and jurist. He was solicitor-general 1829-30; lord chancellor of Ireland 1831-1835 and 1841-46; and was created Lord St. Leonards, and appointed lord high chancellor of England in Lord Derby's first administration in 1852. He wrote "Law of Vendors and Purchasers" (1806), "Powers" (1808), "Law of Property as Administered by the House of Lords" (1849), and other legal treatises.

Subl (zöl). A town in the province of Saxony,

Prussia, situated in the Thüringerwald, on the Lauter, 23 miles south of Gotha. It is famous for manufactures of iron, especially of firearms, and was long called "the armory of Germany." Population (1890), 11,533.

Suhrab (modern Pers. pron. sö-bráb'; earlier, following the Arabic, so-bráb'). In the Shah-namah, the son of Rustam by Tahminah. Rustam kills Suhrab without knowing that he is his son. (See Rustam.) Also Sohrab.

Suidas (sü'i-das). [Gr. Σουίδαξ.] Lived probably in the second half of the 10th century A. D. A Byzantine lexicographer, author of a famous encyclopedic Greek lexicon. "The works of Suidas, like those of Photius, contain a vast store of various learning, singularly useful on points of criticism and literary history. The lexicon of this writer, besides the definition of words, contains accounts of ancient authors of all classes, and many quotations from works that have since perished." Taylor.

The author of the great lexicon which bears the name of Suidas is known to us only from the title-page of this compilation, and from some citations in the commentary of Eustathius. That he was a Byzantine monk is merely a conjecture started by Joannes Reusius and adopted by subsequent scholars. Even the age in which he flourished is quite uncertain; for it cannot be ascertained whether the references to certain personages of a comparatively modern date belong to the original fabric of the lexicon, or were subsequent additions.

Sulla (sul'ä), Lucius Cornelius, surnamed Felix. Born about 138 B. C.; died 78 B. C. A celebrated Roman general and dictator. As questor in the army of Marius he served in the war against Jugurtha 107-103, and captured Jugurtha; fought against the Cimbric and Teutonic 104-101; was praetor in 93; as propraetor in Cilicia in 92 defeated the general of Mithridates and restored Ariobarzanes to the throne of Cappadocia; took part in the Social War 90-89, and captured Bovianum 89; and was consul in 88. The civil war between him and Marius broke out in 88. He led an army against Rome and expelled the Marians (this was the first time that a Roman had led a Roman army against Rome). As commander in the Mithridatic war, 87-84, he defeated Archelaus at Cheronæa in 86 and Orchomenus in 85, and defeated the Marian leader Fimbria in 84. He landed in Italy in 83, and defeated the Marians in 83 and 82, and the Samnites at the Colline Gate in 82. He issued a sweeping proscription against his enemies (see extract below); was appointed dictator in 82; and was consul in 80. He attempted various constitutional reforms; reorganized the senate and the judiciary; established military colonies in Italy; and resigned the dictatorship in 79.

One of his first acts was to draw up a list of his enemies who were to be put to death, which list was exhibited in the forum to public inspection, and called a Proscriptio. It was the first instance of the kind in Roman history. All persons in this list were outlaws, who might be killed by any one with impunity, even by slaves; their property was confiscated to the state, and was to be sold by public auction.

He was a delegate to Congress in 1780; and was president of New Hampshire 1786-89.

Sullivan's Island. [Named from Gen. John Sullivan.] An island at the entrance of Charleston harbor, South Carolina, east of Charleston; the site of Fort Moultrie.

Sullivant (sul'i-vant), William Starling. Born near Columbus, Ohio, Jan. 15, 1803; died there, April 30, 1873. An American botanist, noted as a bryologist. He wrote "Musci Alleghanienses" (1846), "Musci and Hepaticæ of the United States East of the Mississippi River" (1846), "Fomes Muscorum" (1864), etc.

Sully (sul'i; F. pron. sü-lë'), Duc de (Maximilien de Béthune, Baron de Rosny). Born at Rosny, France, Dec. 13, 1560; died at the castle of Villebon, France, Dec. 22, 1641. A French Protestant statesman. He became the companion and friend of Henry of Navarre; served with distinction in the civil wars, especially at Ivry; and became celebrated as minister of finance under Henry IV. (1597-1610). He was made duc de Sully in 1606; was appointed governor of the Bastille in 1692; and was made a marshal by Louis XIII. He was influential in nearly all departments of the government during the reign of Henry IV. He published "Mémoires des sages et royales économies d'état, domestiques, politiques, et militaires, de Henri le Grand" (2 vols. 1634). Two other volumes were published by Jean Le Laboureur in 1662.

The extraordinary form of Sully's Memoirs is well known. They are neither written as if by himself, nor of him as by a historian of the usual kind. They are directly addressed to the hero in the form of an elaborate reminder of his own actions: "You then said this"; "his Majesty thereupon sent you there"; "when you were two leagues from your halting-place, you saw a courier coming," etc. It is needless to say that this manner of telling history is in the highest degree unnatural and heavy; and, after the first quaintness of it wears off, it makes the book very hard to read. It contains, however, a very large number of short memoirs and documents of all kinds, in which the elaborate farce of "Vous" is perforce abandoned. It shows Sully as he was—a great and skilful statesman; but it does not give a pleasant idea of his character.

Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 254.

Sully, James. Born at Bridgwater, Somersetshire, 1842. An English psychologist. He was educated at the Regent's Park College, London, the University of Göttingen, and the University of London. Sumatra (sō-mā'trā). The second largest island of the Malay Archipelago, situated west and south of the Malay Peninsula, from which it is separated by the Strait of Malacca, and separated from Java on the southeast by the Strait of Sunda. It is traversed by a range of mountains (highest point, Indrapura, about 12,500 feet), and has many volcanoes; contains mineral wealth; produces coffee, pepper, sugar, rice, etc.; and is chiefly under the control of the Netherlands. Administrative divisions: West Coast, East Coast, Palembang, Benkulen, Lampung, and Atjeh. The inhabitants are chiefly Malays; among other peoples are the Battaks. The religion is largely Mohammedan. Dutch influence began in the 17th century; Dutch territories in Sumatra were taken by the British 1811, but restored (last English possession, Benkulen, ceded 1825). War against Atchin commenced 1873, and ended with the subjugation and annexation of Atchin, length, 1,100 miles. Area, 161,612 square miles. Population, about 3,000,000.

Sumba. See Sandalwood Island.

Sumbawa (sōm-bā'wā). One of the Sunda Islands, Malay Archipelago, situated east of Lombok and west of Flores. The surface is mountainous and volcanic. The island contains several native states, under Dutch control. It was devastated by an eruption in 1815. Area, estimated, about 5,186 square miles. Population, 150,000.

Sumbe (sōm'be), or Basumbe (bā-sōm'be). A Bantu tribe of Angola, West Africa, settled around Novo Redondo, about lat. 11° S. They form one nation, linguistically and ethnically, with their southern neighbors, the Basile. Inhabiting a hilly and fertile district, they are an athletic, hardy, and industrious people, furnishing the best slaves and contract laborers for the plantations of Angola and S. Thomé, and producing corn and beans for the cities along the coast. The Mbnyi tribe, north of the Basumbe, is also closely allied, but differs in several respects.

Sumbulpur. See Sambalpur.

Sumer (sū'mér). See Sumeria.

Sumeria (sū-mē'ri-ā). In the Assyrian inscriptions, southern or lower Babylonia, the country toward and around the Persian Gulf, as opposed to Akkad (in Gen. x. 10 Accad as name of a city), or North Babylonia. The derivation of the name is uncertain. It is identified with Shinar (see in).

Sumer is Icumen Ie. A very ancient folk-song set to a round or canon. The original manuscript of the music is in the British Museum. Sir Frederick Madden assigns it to the first half of the 13th century.

He was member of Congress from South Carolina 1789-93; United States senator 1801-1809; and United States minister to Brazil 1800-11.

Suny (sō'mé). A town in the government of Kharkoff, southern Russia, situated on the Psio 106 miles northwest of Kharkoff. It is an important trading center for the Ukraine. Population, 19,818.

Sun (sun). The central body of the solar system, around which the earth and other planets revolve, retained in their orbits by its attraction, and supplied with energy by its radiance. Its mean distance from the earth is a little less than 93 millions of miles, its horizontal parallax being 8".80. Its mean apparent diameter is 32' 4"; its real diameter 866,500 miles (209 times that of the earth). Its volume is therefore a little more than 1,300,000 times that of the earth. Its mass—that is, the quantity of matter in it—is 330,000 times as great as that of the earth, and is about 900 times as great as the united masses of all of the planets. The force of gravity at the sun's surface is nearly 28 times as great as at the earth's surface. The sun's mean density is only one fourth that of the earth, or less than 14 times that of water. By means of the spots its rotation can be determined. It is found that the sun's equator is inclined 71° to the plane of the ecliptic. The sun's visible surface is called the photosphere, and is made up of minute irregularly rounded "granules," intensely brilliant, and apparently floating in a darker medium. These are usually 400 or 500 miles in diameter, and so distributed in streaks and groups as to make the surface, seen with a low-power telescope, look much like rough drawing-paper. In the neighborhood of the sun-spots, and to some extent upon all parts of the sun, faculæ (bright streaks due to an unusual crowding together and upheaval of the granules of the photosphere) are found. At the time of a total eclipse certain scarlet cloud-like objects are usually observed projecting beyond the edge of the moon. These are the prominences, called protuberances, which in 1868 were proved by the spectroscopy to consist mainly of hydrogen, and have been discovered to be merely extensions from an envelop of incandescent gases which overlies the photosphere like a sheet of scarlet flame, and is known as the chromosphere. The thickness of this is very irregular, but averages about 5,000 miles. The prominences are often from 50,000 to 100,000 miles in height, and occasionally exceed 200,000; they are less permanent than the spots, and their changes and motions are correspondingly swift. They are not confined to limited zones of the sun's surface; those of the greatest brilliance and activity are, however, usually connected with spots, or with the faculæ which attend the spots. The coroua—the most impressive feature of a total eclipse—is a great "glory," of irregular outline, surrounding the sun, and composed of nebulous rays and streams which protrude from the solar surface, and extend sometimes to a distance of several millions of miles, especially in the plane of the sun's equator. The lower parts are intensely bright, but the other parts are faint and indefinite. Its real nature, as a true solar appendage and no mere optical or atmospheric phenomenon, has been abundantly demonstrated by both the spectroscopy and the camera. The sun is believed to be, in the main, a mass of intensely heated gas and vapor, powerfully compressed by its own gravity. The central part is entirely gaseous, because its temperature, being from physical necessity higher than that of the inclosing photosphere, is far above the so-called "critical point" for every known element: no solidification, no liquefaction even, can therefore occur in the solar depths. But near the outer surface radiation to space is nearly free, the temperature is lowered to a point below the "critical point" of certain substances, and under the powerful pressure due to solar gravity condensation of the vapors begins, and thus a sheet of incandescent cloud is formed, which constitutes the photosphere. The chromosphere consists of the permanent gases and the uncondensed vapors which overlie the cloud-sheet, while the corona still remains in great degree a mystery, as regards both the substances which compose it and the forces which produce and arrange its streamers.

Sunapee Lake (sun'a-pē-lāk). A lake in New Hampshire, 27 miles west-northwest of Concord. Its outlet is through Sugar River into the Connecticut. Length, 8 miles.

Sunart (sūn'ärt), Loch. An arm of the ocean on the coast of Argyllshire, western Scotland, situated north of Mull. Length, 19½ miles.

Sunbury (sun'bu-ri). A village in Middlesex, England, situated on the Thames 16 miles west-southwest of London. Population (1891), 5,677.

Sunbury. The capital of Northumberland County, Pennsylvania, situated on the Susquehanna 42 miles north of Harrisburg. Population (1900), 9,810.

Sund. See Sound, The.

Sunda (sun'dā), Strait of. A sea passage which separates Sumatra and Java. It contains the volcanic island of Krakatoa (which see). Width, about 13 miles.

Sunda Islands. A collective name for a group of islands in the Malay Archipelago. As often used, it includes the Great Sunda (Sumatra, Java, Borneo, Celebes, and smaller islands near them), and the Little Sunda (Bali, Lombok, Sumbawa, Sandalwood Island, Flores, etc., to Timor); sometimes restricted by excluding Celebes and the islands east of Sumbawa; also further restricted by excluding Borneo. Another classification includes the chain from Sumatra to Timor, excluding Borneo and Celebes. Still another classification comprises the smaller islands between Java and Timor.

Sundarbans (sōn'dār-bānz), or Sunderbunds (sōn'dēr-bundz). A wilderness region of swamps and islands in the southern part of the deltas of the Ganges and Brahmaputra, southeast of Calcutta.

Sunda Sea (sun'dā sē). A part of the ocean lying north of Java and south of Borneo; often considered as identical with the Java Sea.

Sunday (sun'dā). The first day of the week; the Christian Sabbath; the Lord's Day. The name Sunday, or 'day of the Sun,' belongs to the first day of the week on astrological grounds, and has long been so used from far beyond the Christian era, and far outside of Christian countries. The ordinary name of the day in Christian Greek and Latin and in the Romance languages is the Lord's Day (Greek κυριακή, Latin dominica, French dimanche, etc.), while the Germanic languages, including English, call it Sunday.

Sunday Island, or Raoul (rā-ōl') Island. A small island of the South Pacific, near lat. 29° 25' S., long. 178° W.

Sunday River. A river in Cape Colony which flows into Algoa Bay 25 miles northeast of Port Elizabeth. Length, about 200 miles.

Sundeeep. See Sundip.

Sunderbunds. See Sundarbans.

Sunderland (sun'dēr-land). A seaport in Durham, England, situated at the mouth of the Wear in lat. 54° 55' N., long. 1° 20' W. It is an important seaport and a coal-mining center, and has also yards for building iron and steel vessels, and manufactures of chemicals, glass, etc. The bridge over the Wear (built 1793-96) is notable. Sunderland includes, besides Sunderland proper, Bishopwearmouth and Monkwearmouth (north of the Wear). The town grew up about a convent founded in Monkwearmouth in the 7th century. Population (1901), 146,977.

Sundewitt (zōn'de-vit). A peninsula in the eastern part of Schleswig-Holstein, Prussia, situated opposite the island of Alsen, north of Flensborg Fjord.

Sundgau (zōnt'gau). A name given to the southern part of Alsace.

Sundi (sōn'dē), or Basundi (bā-sōn'dē). A tribe of the Kongo nation, included in the Kongo State, and settled on the lower Kongo River between Vivi and Manyanga.

Sundip, or Sundeeep (sun-dēp'), or Sandwip (sun-dēp'). An island belonging to British India, situated in the Bay of Bengal at the mouth of the Meghna. Length, 17 miles.

Sundsvall (sōnds'vål). A seaport in the laen of Hernösand, Sweden, situated on the Gulf of Bothnia in lat. 62° 23' N., long. 17° 19' E. It has considerable trade and manufactures. Population, 13,215.

Sune. See Zuñi.

Sunflower (sun'flou'ēr) River. A river in western Mississippi which flows into the Yazoo 27 miles northeast of Vicksburg. Length, about 150 miles.

Sung (sōng). A medieval kingdom in southern China, reduced by Kublai Khan in the 13th century.

Sungari (sōn-gā-rē' or sōn-gā'rē), or Songari (sōn-gā-rē' or sōn-gā'rē). A river in Manchuria which flows into the Amur about lat. 47° 30' N. Length, including the Nonni, over 1,000 miles.

Sungaria, or Soongaria (sōn-gā'rē-ā), or Dzungaria (dzōn-gā'rē-ā), or Songaria (sōn-gā'rē-ā). A name given to a province of Ili, in the Chinese empire; called also the "Northern Circuit." It lies south of the Altai, west of Mongolia, and east and south of Asiatic Russia. But the name is sometimes restricted to a part of this province. It was the nucleus of a Mongol kingdom, that of the Songares, in the 17th and 18th centuries.

Sungei Ujong (sōn'gē ō-jōng'). A small native state in the Malay Peninsula, British protectorate, attached to the Straits Settlements. Population (1891), 26,602.

Sunium (sū'ni-um). [Gr. Σοῦνιον.] 1. In ancient geography, the promontory at the south-eastern extremity of Attica, Greece, now known as Cape Colonna. It contains the ruins of a temple of Athena, a famous landmark from the sea. It was a Doric peripteros of white marble, of 6 by 12 or 13 columns, on a stylobate of 3 steps, measuring 44 by 98 feet. Twelve columns are still standing, with part of the cella. The col-umnas have only 16 channels, and are 20 feet high. The temple possessed a frieze sculptured with the exploits of Theseus.

2. In ancient geography, a town on the promontory of Sinium.

Sunk Islet (sungk'īlet). A small district in Yorkshire, England, situated near the estuary of the Humber, southeast of Hull; formerly an islet.

Sunnis. See Sunnites.

Sunnites (sun'its). A Mohammedan sect comprising the greater part of the Moslem world, usually claiming to be the traditional or orthodox sect. They recognize the first three califs as legitimate successors of Mohammed, and accept six books of the Sunna, or 'rule,' which purport to contain the verbal utterances of Mohammed, in contradistinction to the Koran, the written revelation. The Sunnites are opposed by the Shiites, who hold that Ali was the first legitimate successor of Mohammed. They also have five books of traditions differing from those of the Sunnites. In the course of time many differences of practice have grown up. The Mohammedans of Turkey, Arabia, North Africa, and India are mostly Sunnites, those of Persia and many in India being Shiites. Also Sunnis.

The Turks were orthodox Sunnites, or believers in the conventional doctrine of the Koran and in the traditions handed down by the respectable divines of the orthodox school. The Persians, on the other hand, were Shias, or believers in a somewhat mystical variety of Islam, which presented many and important differences from the orthodox teaching, and offered not a few temptations to political as well as religious revolution.

Poole, Story of Turkey, p. 154.

Sunnyside (sun'ī sīd). The house in which Washington Irving resided at Irvington, New York. It was built in the 17th century, and was originally known as "Wolfert's Roost."

Sunol (sō'nōl). An American bay trotting mare by Electioneer, dam Waxana: Waxana by General Benton out of Waxy. Waxy was supposed to have been a thoroughbred daughter of Lexington. Sunol was foaled in 1886, and held all age records except that for one year until 1891, when she broke Maud S.'s record of 2:08½ by a mile on a kite-shaped track in 2:08½.

Sun's Darling, The. A "moral masque" by Ford and Dekker, licensed in 1624 and published in 1656. It is probably an old play of Dekker's ("Phaetón") worked into its present shape by Ford. The songs are evidently by Dekker.

Süntel (zūn'tel). A group of mountains in Germany, about 20 miles southwest of Hannover. Height, about 1,400 feet.

Survilliers, Comte de. See Bonaparte, Joseph.

Surya (sūr'ya). [In Skt., an adjective of relation (from svar, the sun, sunlight, light; pronounced in the Veda suar) which came to be used substantively.] The Sun; in the Rigveda one of the two most common designations of the Sun, the other being Savitri. Surya is called the son of Dyaus and also the son of Aditi, while in some passages he is distinguished from the Adityas. In one place Ushas, the Dawn, is said to be his wife, while in another the Dawns are said to produce him together with Sacrifice and Agni. He moves on a car drawn sometimes by one, sometimes by several or by seven, fleet and ruddy horses or mares. Pushan goes as his messenger with his golden ships, which sail in the aerial ocean. Surya is the preserver of all things stationary and moving, the vivifier of men, and common to them all, and beholds the good and bad deeds of mortals. He is the eye of Mitra and Varuna, and sometimes also of Agni. He is at times identified with Indra, but in many passages his position is dependent, his path being prepared by Indra, the Ushases, Soma, Dhatri, Varuna, Mitra and Varuna, Indra and Varuna, Indra and Vishnu, or the Angirases, when the divine personality of the sun is thrown into the background, and it becomes little more than a part of nature. (On Surya in the Veda, see Muir's "Original Sanskrit Texts," V. 155-161.) There is also a feminine personality Suryā (sūr-ya), who is sometimes merely the sun personified as feminine, sometimes the wife of Surya, sometimes the daughter of Surya or Savitri and given in marriage to Soma, the Moon. The Suryā or Suryāsuktā, 'Suryā hymn' (Rigveda X. 85), describing this wedding plays an important part in the wedding ceremony.

Suryasiddhanta (sūr-ya-sid-dhān'ta). [Sanskrit title: 'Siddhanta of the Sun.'] A celebrated astronomical work in Sanskrit, said to be a direct revelation from the Sun, and thought by some to be the same as the Saurasiddhanta, or one of the five earlier works on which was founded the Panchasiddhantika of Varahamihira, who lived about the beginning of the 6th century A. D. The Suryasiddhanta has been edited by Fitzedward Hall and Bapu Deva Sbastri in the "Bibliotheca Indica," and translated by the latter for the same series. The "Journal of the American Oriental Society" (Vol. VI) also contains a translation nominally by Ebenezer Burgess, but practically by W. D. Whitney, accompanied by a very thorough commentary by Whitney, one of the most valuable contributions of that scholar to Oriental research.

Sus (sōs). A mountainous district in Morocco, lying south and southwest of the city of Morocco.

Susa (sō'sā). In ancient geography, the capital of Susiana or Elam, situated between the rivers Kerkha and Dizful, about lat. 32° N., long. 48° 25' E.; the modern Sūs or Shush, and the scriptural Shushan. It was a royal residence and flourishing city throughout the period of the Achaemenid kings. The site at present exhibits a group of large and high mounds, forming together a diamond-shaped figure about 3½ miles in circuit. Excavations were made in 1851 by Loftus in one of the mounds, with the result of disclosing the palace of Artaxerxes Mnemon, the chief feature being a colonnade of 340 feet front. The excavations of Dieulafoy, between 1884 and 1886, laid bare beneath these ruins those of the palace of Darius, son of Hystaspes, and showed that the upper strata of the mound are formed by superposed layers of ruins, still but imperfectly explored.

Susa (sō'sā). A seaport in Tunis, situated on the Gulf of Hamama 72 miles south by east of Tunis; probably the ancient Hadrumetum. Population, about 8,000.

It rises in Tibet near the source of the Brahmaputra; flows generally west; breaks through the Himalayas; receives the Bias, and is known also as the Ghara; unites with the Chenab, and is known as the Panjnad; and flows into the Indus about lat. 29° N. Length, about 1,000 miles; navigable to near Ludhiana.

Sutra (sō'tra). In Sanskrit, originally a 'thread, cord,' and then a brief rule, or book of such rules, so named because each rule was a short 'line,' or because the collection was a 'string' of rules. These rules appear to have been at first mere aids to the memory of teachers, whence they came to be the basis of teaching not only in religious ritual but also in philosophy and grammar. Thus there are the Shrautasutras, and among them especially the Kalpasutras, founded on Shruti (see Smṛiti and Shruti) and treating especially of ritual, and the Gṛhyasutras and Samayacharikasutras or Dharmasutras, which are 'rules for domestic ceremonies' and 'rules for conventional customs,' the last two being called collectively Smāntasutras, as based on Smṛiti. Out of the last grew the Dharmasāstra or 'law-books.' Each system of philosophy has its text-book written in Sutras. Examples in grammar and related subjects are the celebrated Sutras of Panini, the Unadisutras on certain affixes, and the Pratishakyas on Vedic accent and phonetics.

Swan, The Mantuan. See Mantuan Swan.

Swan, Knight of the. A local religious myth of Brabantine origin. The principal part of the story is that of a mysterious knight who appears in a small boat drawn by a swan, and performs helpful deeds, saves the lady of the story, and marries her, but who can remain with her only on condition that she does not ask his name: this connects him with the Knights of the Grail, who were obliged to disappear if questioned. The condition having been broken, the swan and boat reappear and he is carried swiftly away. This story is very ancient, and is told of Helias, Lohengrin (in the Round Table cycle), Salvinus, Gerhard the Swan, and others, and the lady is Elise of Brabant or Beatrice of Cleves. There are numerous romances in French, German, and English on this subject. The story of the seven swan-maidens is another myth pieced on to the genuine story of the Knight of the Swan.

It was in commemoration of the beautiful myth of the Swan-Knight that Frederick II. of Brandenburg instituted the Order of the Swan, in 1440. . . . The badge of the Cleves order of knighthood was also a silver swan suspended from a gold chain. Charles, Duke of Cleves, attempted to revive the Order of the Swan. When Cleves fell to Prussia, the Count de Bar endeavored to persuade Frederick the Great to resuscitate the order, but in vain. With Anne of Cleves, the white swan passed to our taven sign-boards.

Sweden (swë'den). [Formerly also Sveeden; F. Suède, D. Zweden, G. Schweden; orig. dat. pl. of Sweede, D. Zweed, G. Schwede, Goth. Swētha* (pl. Swēthans in Jordanes); a form appar. diff. from the other designation, AS. Sweón, Swiön, Icel. Sviar, Sw. Svear, L. Suiones, also Succi, whence the ML. name Succia (It. Svezia, Sp. Suecia). The Sw. name for Sweden is Sverige, Dan. Sverrig, Icel. Sviariki, kingdom of the Svear or Swedes.] A kingdom of Europe, in the eastern part of the Scandinavian peninsula. Capital, Stockholm. It is bounded by Norway on the west and north, Finland, the Gulf of Bothnia, and the Baltic Sea on the east, the Baltic on the south, and the Sound, Cattegat, and Skager Rack on the S. W.; and extends from lat. 55° 20' to 69° 3' N., and from long. 11° 6' to 24° 8' E. There are three main divisions: Gotland in the south, Svealand in the center, and Norrland in the north. The surface is generally hilly; a mountain-range (the Kolen) runs along the northwestern boundary between Sweden and Norway. The kingdom contains many lakes (Wenera, Wetteren, Malar, etc.) and rivers, and comprises many neighboring islands, including Gotland and Öland. The leading occupation is agriculture. There is considerable mineral wealth, particularly iron. Timber, iron, hardware and wooden wares, etc., are exported. The country is subdivided into 25 laens or provinces. The government is a hereditary constitutional monarchy, legislative authority being vested in the king and the Riksdag of two houses (both elected). Sweden and Norway have been united under the same king since 1814, and are bound to stand by each other in war, but are otherwise free and independent. The inhabitants are mostly Swedes: there are a few Finns and Lapps in the north. The prevailing religion is Protestant (Lutheran). Sweden was inhabited in early times by various tribes, the chief of them being the Goths in the south and the Swedes in the north. Christianity was finally established about the end of the 11th century. A fusion of the Goths and Swedes took place in the 13th century. The union of the three kingdoms Denmark, Sweden, and Norway was effected at Kalmar in 1397. A rebellion against the Danes was led by Gustavus Vasa, who was elected king in 1523. The Reformation was introduced by him. Sweden became one of the leading European powers in the 17th century. It took a leading part in the Thirty Years' War under Gustavus Adolphus and his successor; obtained a large part of Pomerania, Bremen, Verden, etc., in 1648; carried on successful wars with Denmark and Poland; received Livonia, Estonia, Scania, etc., in 1660; carried on the Northern War, under Charles XII., against Denmark, Russia, Poland, and Saxony; ceded a large part of its possessions in northern Germany in 1719-1720; ceded Livonia, Estonia, etc., to Russia in 1721; and ceded Finland to Russia in 1809. Norway was united with it in 1814. Its remaining possessions in Germany were ceded to Prussia in 1815. Area, 172,876 square miles. Population (1900), 5,130,441.

Swedenborg (swë'dn-börg; Sw. pron. svä'den-börg) (originally Svedberg or Swedberg), Emanuel. Born at Stockholm, Jan. 29, 1668; died at London, March 29, 1772. A celebrated Swedish philosopher and theosophist, founder of the New Church. He was educated at Upsala; traveled in Europe 1710-14; was appointed assessor of the Swedish college of mines in 1716; distinguished himself at the siege of Frederikshall in 1718 by the invention of machines for the transport of boats overland from Strömstad to Iddefjord; and was subsequently elevated to the nobility. About 1743 he commenced to have "visions," and in 1747 resigned his office in order to devote himself wholly to the expounding of Scripture as the immediate mouth-piece of God. His chief theological and mystical work is "Arcana celestia" (1749-56). Among his other works are "Opera philosophica et mineralogica" (1734), "Economia regni animalis" (1740-41), and "Regnum animale" (1744). See Suedenborgians.

Swedenborgians (swë'dn-bör'ji-anz). The believers in the theology and religious doctrines of Swedenborg; the New-Churchmen. Swedenborg held Rev. xli. 2, "And I John saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven," to be a prediction of the establishment of a new dispensation, the initiation of which took place by the execution of the last judgment in the spiritual world in the year 1757, whereby man was restored to moral freedom by the restriction of evil inclinations, the power of which had threatened its utter extinction. In proof of this belief, his followers point to the unparalleled spiritual and material progress of mankind. They were first organized in London (where Swedenborg long resided) in 1783 under the name of the "Society of the New Church signified by the New Jerusalem," usually abbreviated to New Church. Professed Swedenborgians, though widely scattered, have never been numerous.

but Swedenborg himself appears not to have contemplated the formation of a separate church, trusting to the permeation of his doctrines through the existing churches. Swedenborgians believe that this process is going on, and that thus the new dispensation is making its way independently of their own organization or efforts, and even without the conscious knowledge of most of those affected by it. Swedenborg considered himself the divinely appointed herald and expounder of this dispensation, being prepared for the office by open intercourse during many years with spirits and angels (all originally human beings), and with God himself, who revealed to him the spiritual or symbolic sense of the Divine Word (which the world had not previously been in a state to receive or apprehend), setting forth spiritual and celestial truths in every part through the correspondence of all material things with the spiritual principles, good or evil, of which they are the outgrowth and manifestation. This doctrine of correspondences is the foundation of his system, which he elaborated with uniform consistency in many volumes, all first published in Latin. In this correspondence consists the plenary inspiration of the Word, which includes only the Pentateuch, Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, the Prophets and Psalms, the four Gospels, and the Apocalypse; the other books of the Bible are valuable for instruction, but lack this divine character.

Swedish (swē'dish). The language of the Swedes; a Scandinavian dialect akin to Danish and Norwegian-Icelandic. Old Swedish is preserved in runic inscriptions from the end of the viking age in the 11th century, and in literature from late in the 13th century. Modern Swedish dates from the Reformation.

Swedish Nightingale, The. Jenny Lind.

Swedish Pomerania. A name formerly given to the western part of Pomerania, which was granted to Sweden at the peace of Westphalia in 1648. It comprised Vorpommern and Rügen, and part of Hinterpommern. Part of it was ceded to Prussia in 1720; the remainder was ceded to Denmark in 1814, and by Denmark to Prussia in 1815.

Sweedlepipe (swē'dl-pip). Paul or Poll. In Dickens's "Martiu Chuzzlewit," a bird-fancier and "easy shaver," Mrs. Gamp's landlord: "a disapp'intin' Sweedlepipes."

Sweeny (swē'ni). Thomas William. Born at Cork, Ireland, Dec. 25, 1820; died at Astoria, Long Island, N. Y., April 10, 1892. An American general. He served in the Mexican war, and in the Civil War (at Wilson's Creek, Fort Donelson, and Shiloh, and in the Atlanta campaign); and took part in the Fenian invasion of Canada.

Sweet Singer of the Temple. George Herbert.

Sweetwater (svēt' wā'tēr) Mountains. A range of the Rocky Mountains in Wyoming, southeast of the Wind River Mountains, and northwest of the Medicine Bow Mountains.

Sweetwater River. A tributary of the North Fork of the Platte, in central Wyoming. Length, about 150 miles.

Swegen. See Swegn.

Swerga. See Swarga.

Swetchine (svech-ēn'). Madame (Anne Sophie Soymonoff). Born at Moscow, 1782; died at Paris, 1857. A Russian author. Her works and letters were edited by Falloux.

Swett (swet), Samuel. Born at Newburyport, Mass., June 9, 1782; died at Boston, Oct. 28, 1866. An American historical writer. He published "Bunker Hill," controversial and other works on that battle, etc.

Swegn, or Swein (swān), or Swegen (svā'gen), or Svend (svend). Died 1014. King of Denmark, son of Harold Blaataud and father of Canute. He invaded England in 994 and 1003, and conquered England in 1013.

Swegn, or Swein. Died about 1051. An English earl, eldest son of Godwine. He was outlawed and exiled in 1046; was restored; and was finally exiled with Godwine in 1051.

Swegn. Died 1076. King of Denmark 1047-1076, son of Canute. He invaded England in 1068.

Swift (swift), Jonathan. Born at Dublin, Nov. 30, 1667; died there, Oct. 19, 1745. A celebrated English satirist and man of letters; usually spoken of as Dean Swift. His grandfather, Thomas Swift, vicar of Goodrich in Herefordshire, was a follower of Charles I. Swift matriculated at Trinity College, Dublin, in 1682, leaving with only a degree speciali gratia in 1686. In 1688, owing to the Revolution, he went to England, and in 1689 became amanuensis or secretary to Sir William Temple (who was in some way related to Swift's mother) at Moor Park, near Farnham. He disliked his subordinate position, and returned to Dublin in about a year. In 1692 he received the degree of B. A. at Oxford, took orders in 1695, and in 1695 obtained the living of Kilroot, Antrim, Ireland. In 1696, tired of obscurity, he returned to Sir William Temple, and remained with him till his death in Jan., 1699. During these years of quiet he not only read much, but was in such relations with the court as to obtain an insight into politics which later was of use to him. In 1696 he wrote "A Tale of a Tub," and in 1697 the "Battle of the Books" (both published in 1704); he also published an edition of Temple's works (1700-1703). He was made rector of Agher, in Meath, and vicar of Laracor in 1700, and held other small livings. In 1696 he had offered marriage to Miss Waring ("Varina"), who refused him on account of her ill health and his poverty.

When he received the living of Laracor, however, in 1700, she wished the marriage to take place. He broke off the match by saying that if she would submit to be educated so that she could entertain him, soothe his ill humor, accept his likes and dislikes, etc., he would overlook deficiencies in looks and income. He published the Whig tract "A Discourse on the Dissensions in Athens and Rome" in 1703. At Laracor he was joined by Mrs. Rebecca Dingley and by Esther Johnson (born in 1651, a dependent of Sir William Temple, who presided over his house—the "Stella" of later years. In 1708 he published the pamphlets "The Sentiments of a Church of England Man" and "On the Reasonableness of a Test"; these were followed by the ironical "Argument Against Abolishing Christianity" and by his best poem, "Baucis and Philemon." He was in London for a longer or shorter period nearly every year from 1701 to 1710. At this time he abandoned the Whigs and went over to the Tories; a full account of this is given in the "Journal to Stella," written 1710-13, and not intended for the public. In Nov., 1710, he began to write for the "Examiner," a Tory journal, and formed the "Society of Brothers." In July, 1711, he left the "Examiner," but continued to write Tory pamphlets ("The Conduct of the Allies" and "Remarks on the Barrier Treaty"). He was appointed by Queen Anne dean of St. Patrick's, Dublin, in 1713. He was intimately associated with Oxford and Bolingbroke, and was a friend of Steele, Addison, Pope, Arbuthnot, Congreve, Atterbury, Parnell, and Gay. Some of his best work belongs to this period—the last four years of Queen Anne. After the fall of the Tories he retired to Dublin. While living in London, Esther Vanhomrigh, the "Vanessa" of his poem "Cadenus and Vanessa," had formed an attachment for him. In 1714 her mother died, and she followed Swift to Dublin. It is generally said that in 1716 he was privately married to "Stella," and in 1717 "Vanessa" retired to Marley Abbey at Celbridge, where Swift visited her. In 1723 "Vanessa" wrote to Swift, "Stella" replied that she was his wife, and sent "Vanessa's" letter to Swift, who at once, in one of his characteristic fits of passion, went to "Vanessa," threw her letter on a table without a word, and rode away. This was her death-blow; she lived only a few weeks longer. Swift devoted himself earnestly to the condition of Ireland and Irish politics, and in 1730 published his "Proposal for the Universal Use of Irish Manufactures," urging the disuse of English goods by the Irish. A patent for supplying Ireland with copper coins had been accorded to one William Wood, who shared a 40 per cent. profit with the Duchess of Kendal, the king's mistress. In 1724 Swift attacked this abuse in letters signed "M. B. Drapier," which raised his popularity to a height that it always retained. Returning to England, he was recalled on account of "Stella's" illness, but she did not die till 1728. In 1726 he published "Gulliver's Travels," and in 1729 his "Modest Proposal for Preventing the Children of Poor People in Ireland from being a Burden to their Parents"—his ironical suggestion being that they should be fattened and eaten. In his later years his brain became diseased, and he was alternately in a state of torture and apathetic torpor; for a year or two his intellect was almost wholly eclipsed, a fact of which he was conscious at intervals. He was put under restraint in 1741, and lingered till 1745. He was buried in St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin. With Arbuthnot and Pope he carried out the scheme of the "Scriblerus Club" (which see). Among his works not mentioned above are "Pindaric" ("Predictions for 1703" (1708: an attack upon astrology in the person of Partridge, the almanac-maker, in which Swift assumed the character of an almanac-maker and the name of Isaac Bickerstaffe), "A Project for the Advancement of Religion" (1709: "the only work to which he ever put his name"), "Vindication of Bickerstaffe" (1709), "Proposal for Correcting, Improving, and Ascertaining the English Tongue" (1712), "Free Thoughts on the State of Public Affairs" (1714), "History of the Last Four Years of Queen Anne" (not published till 1757-58: a number of volumes of miscellanies with Arbuthnot, Pope, Gay, Sheridan, and others), "The Legion Club" (1735: a satire against the Irish House of Commons), "Directions to Servants," and "Polite Conversation" (1738).

Swift, Lewis. Born at Clarkson, N. Y., Feb. 29, 1820. A distinguished American astronomer, director of the Warner Observatory at Rochester, New York, and subsequently of Lowe Observatory. He is especially noted as a discoverer of comets and nebulae.

Swilly (swil'i). Lough. An inlet of the Atlantic in Ulster, Ireland, northwest of Londonderry. Length, 25 miles.

Swinburne (swin'bērn), Algernon Charles. Born at London, April 5, 1837. An English poet, son of Admiral Swinburne and Lady Henrietta Ashburnham, daughter of the third Earl of Ashburnham. He was educated in France, and at Eton and Oxford (Balliol College), entering the university in 1857 and leaving without a degree. He is especially remarkable for his facile metrical invention. He has published "The Queen Mother" and "Rosamund" (1861), "Atalanta in Calydon" (1864), "Chastelard: a Tragedy" (1865), "Poems and Ballads" (1866; these were so severely censured that the edition was withdrawn, but it was reprinted the same year as "Laus Venenis, and other Poems and Ballads," and Swinburne replied to the criticism (also in 1866) with "Notes on Poems and Reviews"; "William Blake: a Critical Essay" (1867), "An Ode on the Proclamation of the French Republic" (1870), "Songs Before Sunrise" (1871), "Under the Microscope" (1872; an answer to Robert Buchanan's pamphlet "The Fleshly School"), "Bothwell's Tragedy" (1873), "Songs of Two Nations" (1875), "Essays and Studies" (1875), "George Chapman: a Critical Essay" (1875), "Erechtheus: a Tragedy" (1876), "A Note on Charlotte Eronté" (1877), a second series of "Poems and Ballads" (1878), "A Study of Shakspeare" (1879), "The Modern Heptalogia, or the Seven Against Sense" (1880), "Songs of the Springtides" (1880), "Studies in Song" (1880), "Mary Stuart: a Tragedy" (1881), "Tristram of Lyonesse, etc." (1882), "A Century of Roundels" (1883), "A Midsummer Holiday, etc." (1884), "Marino Faliero: a Tragedy" (1885), "Prose Miscellanies" (1886), "A Study of Victor Hugo" (1886), "A Study of Ben Jonson" "Lochrine: a Tragedy" (1887), "The Armada" (1888), and "Poems and Ballads" (1889).

Swinemünde (svē'ne-mün-de). A seaport in the province of Pomerania, Prussia, situated on the island Usedom, at the mouth of the Swine, in lat. 53° 55' N., long. 14° 17' E. It forms the outer port of Stettin. It is a watering-place, and has an excellent harbor and important commerce. Population (1890), 8,508.

Swing (swing), Captain. A fictitious name signed to various threatening letters in England, about 1830, especially to letters addressed to the users of threshing-machines, which were obnoxious to the old-fashioned threshers.

Swing (swing), David. Born at Cincinnati, Ohio, Aug. 23, 1830; died Oct. 3, 1894. An American Presbyterian clergyman, tried for heresy in Chicago in 1874, and acquitted. He was afterward pastor of an independent church.

Swinton (swin'ton). A village in Lancashire, England, 6 miles west-northwest of Manchester. Population (1891), with Pendlebury, 20,197.

Swinton. A manufacturing town in Yorkshire, England, 10 miles northeast of Sheffield. Population (1891), 9,697.

Swinton, William. Born in Haddingtonshire, Scotland, April 23, 1833; died at New York, Oct. 24, 1892. An American journalist and author. He became connected with the "New-York Times" in 1858, and was its war correspondent 1862-64; his letters several times involved him in difficulties with the military authorities. From 1869 to 1874 he was professor of English at the University of California. He wrote a series of historical and other text-books, and "Rambles Among Words" (1859), "The Times's Review of McClellan: his Military Career Reviewed and Exposed" (1864), "Campaigns of the Army of the Potomac" (1866), "Twelve Decisive Battles of the War" (1867), "History of the New York Seventh Regiment during the Rebellion" (1870), etc.

Swiss Family Robinson. A romance by Rodolphe Wyss. The scene is laid in a desert island about 1800.

Swiss Guards, The. A corps of Swiss mercenary troops in the French service, formed in 1616 and finally disbanded in 1830. They are celebrated for their valor in the defense of the Tuileries, Aug. 10, 1792, commemorated in the "Lion of Lucerne" at Lucerne.

Swithin (swith'in), or Swithun (swith'un), Saint. Born near Winchester, probably about 800; died about 862. A bishop of Winchester. It was fabled that he performed many miraculous cures after his death, and he was translated with great ceremony July 15, 971. He was not regularly canonized, but received his title of saint on his translation. He has, for no known reason, become associated in the popular mind with drunkenness. He is noted in folk-lore, a common adage being that if it rains on St. Swithin's day (July 15), it will rain for forty days after.

Switzerland (swit'zēr-land). [Land of the Switzers'; G. Die Schweiz, F. Suisse, It. Svizzera, Sp. Suiza.] A country of Europe, bounded by France on the west and northwest, Alsace and Baden on the north, the Lake of Constance on the northeast, Vorarlberg and Tyrol on the east, and Italy and France on the south: Latin Helvetia, Capital, Bern. The main range of the Alps in the south (partly on the Italian border) is separated from a secondary range of the Alps (Bernese Oberland, Todi, Santis, etc.) by the valleys of the Rhone and Rhine: the Jura is in the west and north. (See Alps.) The highest mountain is Monte Rosa (over 15,000 feet). The chief lakes are the Lakes of Geneva, Constance, Lucerne, Zurich, and Neuchâtel. The leading industries are cotton, woolen, and silk manufactures, straw-plaiting, manufactures of embroidery, clocks and watches, wooden wares, chemicals, machinery, music-boxes, etc., and dairy-farming. The country contains many pleasure- and health-resorts, and is famous as a summer resort of tourists. It contains 22 cantons united in a confederation, the several cantons being very largely independent in internal matters. The government of the confederation is vested in a federal assembly of two chambers: the State Council ("Ständerath" or "Conseil des États") of 44 members (2 for each canton), and the National Council ("Nationalrath" or "Conseil National"), with 147 representatives. The Federal Assembly in joint session elects the executive body, the Federal Council ("Bundesrath" or "Conseil Fédéral"), of 7 members, and also the president of the Federal Council, who is elected for one year as president of the Swiss Confederation. "Whenever a petition demanding the revision or annulment of a measure passed by the Legislature is presented by 30,000 citizens, or the alteration is demanded by eight cantons, the law in question must be submitted to the direct vote of the nation. This principle, called the referendum, is frequently acted on." (The Statesman's Year-Book, 1894, p. 997.) Cantonal government is exercised by a great council or directly by the citizens in popular assembly ("Landesgemeinde"). About three fifths of the inhabitants are Protestants and about two fifths Roman Catholics. About 2,000,000 speak German, 600,000 French, 160,000 Italian, and 38,000 Romansh. The ancient inhabitants were Helveti and other tribes. The land became part of the Roman Empire and largely of the province of Gaul, and was settled by Burgundians, Alamanni, etc. The league between Uri, Schwyz, and Nidwald (in Unterwalden) against Hapsburg oppression was formed 1291. The legend of Tell and the founding of the confederation at Rütli are assigned to the beginning of the 14th century. The Swiss defeated the Austrians at Morgarten in 1315, and renewed the league the same year. Lucerne joined the confederation in 1332, Zurich in 1351, Glarus in 1352, Zug in 1352, and Bern in 1353. The Austrians were defeated at Sempach in 1386, and various conquests were made in the 14th century. Besides its own members, the confederation recognized "associates" and "protected districts." The Swiss were freed from Austrian claims in 1394 and 1474. They defeated Charles the Bold of Burgundy at Granson and Murten in 1476. The "Compact of Stanz" was formed in 1481. Fribourg and Solothurn were admitted in 1481. Switzerland became practically independent of the Empire in 1499. Basel and Schaffhausen were admitted in 1501, and Appenzel in 1513. The Swiss were defeated at Marignano by Francis I. of France in 1515, and concluded peace with France in 1516. The Reformation was introduced into various parts by Zwingli, Farel, Calvin, etc. The Golden League between Catholic members was formed in 1586. Switzerland became formally independent of the Empire in 1648. The Helvetic Republic was established in 1798, under the influence of France. A revolt of the Forest Cantons was suppressed by the French in 1798, and the country was the scene of much fighting in the wars of the Directory and Consulate. The confederation was restored in 1803, and the cantons of St. Gall, Grisons, Aargau, Thurgau, Ticino, and Vaud were added. A new constitution was adopted, neutrality was guaranteed, and the cantons of Geneva, Valais, and Neuchâtel were added in 1815. The war of the "Sonderbund" occurred in 1847. Government was made more centralized by the constitution of 1848. Neuchâtel was freed from Prussian claims in 1857. The constitution was revised in 1874. Area, 15,976 square miles. Population (1900), 3,325,023.

Such is the Switzerland of our own time, but such was not the Switzerland with which Charles the Bold had to deal. In those days the name of Switzerland, as a distinct nation or people, was hardly known. The names Swiss, Switzer, Switzois, Suisses, were indeed beginning to spread themselves from a single canton to the whole Confederation; but the formal style of that Confederation was still the "Great (or Old) League of Upper Germany"—perhaps rather of "Upper Swabia." That League was much smaller than it is now, and it was purely German. It consisted of eight German districts and cities, united, like many other groups of German cities, by a lax Federal tie, which tie, while other similar unions have died away, has gradually developed into a perfect Federal Government, and has extended itself over a large non-German territory. The League then consisted of eight cantons only—Zürich, Bern, Luzern, Uri, Schwyz, Unterwalden, Zug, and Glarus. Freeman, Hist. Essays, I. 353.

Swiveller (swiv'ler), Dick. A happy-go-lucky, devil-may-care fellow in Dickens's "Old Curiosity Shop."

Altogether, and because of rather than in spite of his weaknesses, Dick is a captivating person. His gaiety and good humour survive such accumulations of "staggerers," he makes such discoveries of "the rosy" in the very smallest of drinks, and becomes himself by his solacements of verse such a "perpetual grand Apollo," that his failings are all forgiven, and hearts resolutely shut against victims of destiny in general open themselves freely to Dick Swiveller. Forster, Life of Dickens, ii. 7.

Swordfish, The. See Xiphias.

Sword of God, The. A name given to the Saracen conqueror Khaled.

Sword of Rome, The. A name sometimes given to Marcellus.

Swords (sórdz), Thomas. Born at New York, Nov. 1, 1806; died there, March 20, 1886. An American general. He served in the conquest of New Mexico and California in the Mexican war, and in the Civil War.

Swynford (swin'förd), Katharine. Died 1403. The third wife of John of Gaunt, mother of the Beauforts and ancestress of Henry VII. of England.

Syagrian (si-ã'gri-an) Promontory. In ancient geography, a headland at the eastern extremity of Arabia.

Syagrius (si-ã'gri-us). The last Roman governor of Gaul. He was defeated by Clovis near Soissons in 486.

Syamantaka (sya-man'ta-ka). In Hindu mythology, a celebrated jewel of which the story is told in the Vishnupurana. It yielded daily eight loads of gold, and expelled all fear of portents, wild beasts, fire, robbers, and famine; but, though an inexhaustible resource to a virtuous, it was deadly to a wicked, wearer. It was given by Surya, the Sun, to Satrajit, Surya recompensing Satrajit for praises rendered him by allowing himself to be seen in his proper form and by the bestowal of the gem. Afraid that Krishna would take it from him, Satrajit gave the jewel to his own brother, Prasena, but Prasena was killed by a lion. Jambuvat, king of the bears, killed the lion and carried off the gem; but Krishna took it from him and restored it to Satrajit, who in thankfulness gave him his daughter Satyabhama in marriage. One of the many suitors of Satyabhama had been Shatadhanvan, who now killed Satrajit in his sleep and carried off the gem. Pursued by Krishna and Balarama, Shatadhanvan gave it to Akrua and continued his flight, but was overtaken and killed by Krishna. As Krishna did not bring back the jewel, Balarama upbraided him with secreting it, and parted from him. Akrua, after fifty-two years, produced it, when it was claimed by Krishna, Balarama, and Satyabhama, and decided that Akrua should keep it, whence he moved about like the sun wearing a garland of light.

Sybaris (sib'ar-is). [Gr. Σύβαρις.] In ancient geography, a city of Magna Græcia, southern Italy, situated near the Gulf of Tarentum in lat. 39° 41' N., long. 16° 28' E. It was founded by Achaean colonists in 720 B. C. It was celebrated for its wealth, and its inhabitants were proverbial for their luxury (whence the epithet Sybarite). It was destroyed by the inhabitants of Crotona in 510 B. C.

Sybaris was one of the most important towns of Magna Græcia. According to Strabo, it was founded by the Achæans (vi. p. 378), probably about B. C. 720. (Clinton's F. H., vol. i., pp. 163, 174.) The colonisation was most likely connected with the gradual conquest of the Peloponnese by the Dorian invaders. Its site is marked by the junction of the Crathis (Crathis) with the Sybaris (Cosile). Sybaris flourished 210 years (Seym. Ch. 1. 300). Its walls were 50 stadia in circumference; it had twenty-five subject cities, and ruled over four neighbouring tribes. In the great war with Crotona, it is said to have brought into the field 300,000 men (Strab. l. s. c.). Its excessive luxury is proverbial. It was taken (B. C. 510) after a siege of 70 days by the Crotonians, who turned the river upon the town, and in this way destroyed it. A second Sybaris arose upon the ruins of the first, but it never flourished, and was finally merged in the Athenian colony of Thurii (B. C. 443), which was built on a spot in the neighbourhood. Herodotus was one of the colonists (Strab.). Kaestlin, Herod., III. 242, note.

Sybel (zē'bel), Heinrich von. Born at Düsseldorf, Prussia, Dec. 2, 1817; died at Marburg, Prussia, Aug. 1, 1895. A noted German historian. He has been a member of the Hessian and Prussian chambers, of the Erfurt Parliament of 1850, and later of the Reichstag, and professor at Marburg, Munich (where he founded the first historical seminary in Germany), and (1861) Bonn. His chief work is "Geschichte der Revolutionszeit 1789-1800" ("History of the Revolutionary Period of 1789-1800," 1853-). His other works include "Geschichte des ersten Kreuzzugs" ("History of the first Crusade," 1841), "Die Entstehung des deutschen Königthums" (1844), and "Die Begründung des deutschen Reiches durch Wilhelm I." ("The Foundation of the German Empire by William I., 1839-90).

Sybil (sib'ül). A political novel by Benjamin Disraeli, published in 1845.

Sybra (sib'ö-täg). In ancient geography, a small island and town on the coast of Epirus, opposite the southern end of Coreyra. Near it, in 432 B. C., was fought a naval battle between Coreyra (aided by Athens) and Corinth.

Sycorax (sik'ö-raks). A witch, the mother of Caliban, referred to in Shakspeare's "Tempest." In Dryden and Davenant's version she is his sister, and a monster like him.

Sydenham (sid'n-am). A suburb of London, in Kent, 7 miles south of London. Near it is the Crystal Palace. Population (1891), 34,162.

Sydenham, Thomas. Born at Winford Eagle, Dorsetshire, England, 1624; died at London, Dec., 1689. A noted English physician, surnamed "the English Hippocrates." In 1642 he entered Magdalen College, Oxford. His course there was interrupted by service in the Parliamentary army; but he graduated (bachelor of medicine) in 1648, and became a fellow of All Souls. In 1663 he was licensed by the College of Physicians to practise in Westminster. He was a warm friend of John Locke and Robert Boyle. His works include "Methodus Curandi Febres" (1666), "Epistole Responsorie" (1680), "Tractatus de Podagra et Hydrope" (1683), etc. Sydenham anticipated modern practice in many ways, especially in a minute study of predisposing causes external and internal, and in assisting natural crises, as well as by the general liberality of his practice.

Sydney (sid'ni). A seaport, capital of New South Wales, Australia, situated on the harbor of Port Jackson, in lat. 33° 52' S., long. 151° 13' E.: one of the two chief cities of Australia. Its suburbs include Glebe, Paddington, etc. Its commerce and manufactures are important, and it is the terminus of various steamship lines. Near it are extensive coal-mines. It is the seat of a mint and of Sydney University. It was settled in 1788 as a convict colony. Population (1891), with suburbs, 333,380.

A distinguished English mathematician, professor successively at University College, London, at the University of Virginia, at Woolwich, at the Johns Hopkins University, and at Oxford (Savilian professor 1883).

Sylvester Daggerwood (sil-ves'tēr dag'er-wūd). A "whimsical interlude" by George Colman the younger, produced in 1795. There are but two characters—Sylvester Daggerwood, a strolling player, and Fustian, a Grub-street playwright.

Sylva. See Silvia.

Sylvius, Æneas. See Pius II.

Sylvius (sil'vi-us), Franz (originally De le Boë). Born at Hanau, Prussia, 1614; died at Leyden, 1672. A German physician, professor of medicine at Leyden.

Sylvius (sil'vi-us) (Jacques Dubois). Born at Amiens, France, 1478; died at Paris, 1555. A French anatomist, lecturer on anatomy at Paris. He made various anatomical discoveries, and invented injection. From him the Sylvian aqueduct, the Sylvian artery, and the Sylvian fissure (of the brain) were named.

Syme. See Symi.

Syme (sim), James. Born at Edinburgh, Nov. 7, 1799; died June 26, 1870. A noted Scottish surgeon. Among his works are "Excision of Diseased Joints" (1831), "Principles of Surgery" (1832), etc.

Symeon, Henry. See the extract.

The instructor [at Oxford] was required to swear that he would never consent "to the reconciliation of Henry Symeon," or reassume the degree of Bachelor of that Faculty. The exact nature of Henry Symeon's offence is not stated, but for century after century the implacable university held him up to the obloquy of every Bachelor who was about to become a Master of Arts. This singular oath has been taken by some men who are still living, for it was not abolished until the year of grace 1827. [*Ward's "Oxford University Statutes," vol. ii., p. 139. Bryan Twyne states that Symeon was a Regent in Arts at Oxford who feigned himself a Bachelor in order to obtain admission to a foreign monastery in which regency in secular arts was not allowed. ("Antiquitates Oxon. Apologia," p. 376.) He does not, however, cite any authority for this plausible explanation.] Lyte, Oxford, p. 214.

Symeon of Durham. See Simcon of Durham.

Symi (sō'mē). A small island off the southwest coast of Asia Minor, 15 miles north of Rhodes: the ancient Syme. It belongs to Turkey.

Symi, Gulf of. An arm of the sea, on the coast of Asia Minor, near the island of Symi.

Symmachus (sim'ä-kus). Lived at the end of the 2d century A. D. The author of a Greek version of the Old Testament, included in Origen's "Hexapla."

Symmachus. Pope 498-514. The "Palmary Synod" was held in his reign (501).

Symmachus, Quintus Aurelius. Lived about 400 A. D. A Roman pagan orator, writer, and politician. He was prefect of Rome, and consul 391. He wrote epistles and orations, fragments of which are extant.

Symonds (sim'ondz or si'moudz), John Addington. Born at Bristol, Oct. 5, 1840; died at Rome, April 19, 1893. An English man of letters. He graduated at Oxford (Balliol College), winning the Newdigate prize in 1860. He published "An Introduction to the Study of Dante" (1872), "Studies of the Greek Poets" (1873-76), and "Sketches in Italy and Greece" (1874). His best-known work, "The Renaissance in Italy," consists of five parts: "The Age of the Despots" (1875), "The Revival of Learning" (1877), "The Fine Arts" (1877), "Italian Literature" (1881), and "The Catholic Reaction" (1886). He also wrote a "Life of Shelley" (1878), "Sketches and Study in Italy" (1879), "Italian Byways" (1883), "Shakespeare's Predecessors in the English Drama" (1884), "Wine, Woman, and Song, etc." (1884: an essay on the Latin songs of the 12th-century students), "Life of Sir Philip Sidney" (1886), "Life of Ben Jonson" (1886), "Life of Michelangelo" (1892), and several volumes of verse. He translated the sonnets of Michelangelo and Campanella (1878), and the autobiography of Benvenuto Cellini (1887).

Symplegades (sim-pleg'ā-dēz). In the legend of the Argonauts, two movable rocky islets at the entrance of the Bosphorus into the Black Sea.

Symposium (sim-pō'si-um). The. [Also sometimes Symposion; from L. symposium, from Gr. συμπόσιον, a drinking-party, drinking after a dinner, from συμπίνειν, drink with or together, from σύν, together, and πίνειν, drink.] 1. A celebrated work by Plato, an account given by Aristodemus of a banquet at the house of the tragic poet Agathon after one of his victories, at which, together with other less famous persons, Socrates, the physician Eryximachus, Aristophanes, and by and by Alcibiades, discuss the nature and praise of Eros (love).—2. A work by Xenophon, describing the character of Socrates.

Syn. See Sin.

Syndesmos (sin-dez'mos). [Gr. σύνδεσμος, a knot.] The fourth-magnitude double star α Piscium, situated at the bend or knot in the ribbon by which the two fishes are represented as joined.

Syndics of the Arquebusiers. A painting by Van der Helst (1657), in the Rijks Museum, Amsterdam, Holland. The four syndics, richly dressed, are seated about a table examining the plate of the guild. Behind is a maid bringing in a large drinking-horn, and to the right in the distance are seen soldiers with longbows.

Syndics of the Guild of the Clothmakers, or De Staalmesters. A masterpiece by Rembrandt (1661), in the Rijks Museum at Amsterdam, Holland. The five syndics, robed in black, are assembled about a table, attended by a servant. It is a striking example of the powerful effects attained by the master with the simplest means.

Synesius (si-nē'shi-us). Born at Cyrene, 378: died about 430 A. D. A Neoplatonist philosopher and writer. He was at Constantinople 397-400, and was bishop of Ptolemais, in the Pentapolis of Libya, about 410-414. His works include letters, hymns, "Encomium Calvitii," "De Providentia," the oration "De Regno," etc.

Synesius, who was born at Cyrene in A. D. 378, must be classed rather with the school of Justin, Clement, and Origen than with the Christian sophists whom we have been considering in the last few sections. Perhaps he was the only eminent Christian in the fourth or fifth century who ventured to maintain the parallel importance of heathen and Christian literature. He was born a pagan, and was not converted to Christianity till he was about thirty years old. He had been a hearer and sincere admirer of Hypatia, and even after he became a Christian and bishop of Ptolemais, towards the end of A. D. 409, he was far from embracing all the tenets of orthodoxy. He did not hesitate to confess in the most candid manner that his doctrines were rather those of Origen than those of Theophilus; and though he declared that his thoughts should never rise in open revolt against his tongue, he conceived himself at liberty to maintain an esoteric faith in accordance with his philosophical convictions, as well as the popular views of Christianity which he preached to his less instructed hearers. He lived to about A. D. 430.

Synnada (sin'ā-dā). [Gr. Σύνναδα.] In ancient geography, a town of Phrygia, Asia Minor, identified with the modern Eski-Karahissar. It is noted for its marble-quarries.

Synod (sin'od), Holy Governing, of all the Russias. A synod which is the highest ecclesiastical authority in the Russian Church. It consists of several metropolitans and other prelates and officials—the chief procurator of the synod representing the czar. It was instituted by Peter the Great, in 1721, to supply the place of the Patriarch of Moscow. The last patriarch had died about 1700, and Peter would not allow the appointment of a successor, thinking the power of the patriarchal office too great. The orthodox national church of the kingdom of Greece is also governed by a synod of archbishops and bishops, independent of any patriarch.

Syphax (si'faks). [Gr. Σίψαξ.] Died about 201 B. C. A king of the Massesylians in western Numidia. He vacillated between the Roman and Carthaginian alliances; was often at war with Masinissa; and was finally allied with Carthage, and married Sophonisba, daughter of Hasdrubal. He overran all of Numidia, but was defeated by Scipio in 203 and taken prisoner to Rome.

Syra (sē'rā). An island of the Cyclades, in the Aegean Sea, belonging to Greece, intersected by lat. 37° 25' N., long. 24° 54' E.: the ancient Syros. Its surface is rocky. It was of minor importance until its settlement by Greek refugees at the time of the war of independence in the 19th century. The chief town is Hermupolis. Length, 11 miles. Population, about 33,000.

Syra (city). See Hermupolis.

Syracuse (sir'ā-kūs). [Gr. Συρακοῦσαι.] A province in the southeastern part of Sicily. Area, 1,442 square miles. Population (1891), 395,797.

Syracuse. [Gr. Συρακοῦσαι, L. Syracuse, It. Siracusa.] A city, capital of the province of Syracuse, situated on the island of Ortygia on the eastern coast of Sicily, in lat. 37° 3' N., long. 15° 18' E. It contains a cathedral (see below) and museum, and some relics of the ancient city are near it. There is a Roman amphitheater, presumably of the time of Augustus, formed of masonry on the south side, and in other parts hewn from the rock. Portions of the ancient barrier in marble remain standing about the arena. The temple of Athee (Pallas), of the 6th century B. C., was famous for its wealth, and was plundered by Verres. In the 7th century it was converted into a church, and is now the cathedral. The temple was Doric, hexastyle, peripteral, with 14 or 15 columns on the flanks, on a stylobate of 3 steps, measuring 74 by 188 feet. The columns of the flanks are embedded in the walls of the cathedral; those of the front were overthrown by an earthquake in 1693. The two columns in antis of the pronaos survive. Proportions and details are of archaic character. The temple of Diana, so called, probably in fact the temple of Apollo, is a Greek Doric structure of the 6th century B. C., with notably archaic features. It was a peripteros of 6 by 19 monolithic columns, on a stylobate of 4 steps. Sixteen columns and a part of the cella wall are standing. Syracuse was founded by Corinthian colonists about 735 B. C. on the island, and spread over the adjoining part of the mainland, forming Achradina, Epipole, Neapolis, etc. Gelon, ruler of Gela, became tyrant of Syracuse in 485 B. C.; and it became the chief power in Sicily. The tyrant Thrasylbulus was expelled about 466, and Syracuse became a democratic commonwealth. It was besieged by the Athenians under Nicias and Demosthenes in 414-413, the Athenians being finally defeated with the aid of Spartan allies in 413. It was under the rule of Dionysius the elder about 405-367; was frequently at war with Carthage; was ruled by Dionysius the younger and Dion, and about 343-337 by Timoleon; had Agathocles as tyrant 317-289; and was defended by Pyrrhus against Carthage about 278. Hiero II., its king, was allied with Rome in the first and second Punic wars. It was allied with Carthage later; was besieged by the Romans under Marcellus 212, captured, and annexed by Rome; and was destroyed by the Saracens in the 9th century. Population (1892), 28,000.

Syracuse. The capital of Onondaga County, New York, situated near Onondaga Lake in lat. 43° 3' N., long. 76° 13' W. It stands on the Erie and Oswego canals; was noted for extensive salt-works (among the largest in the country); has varied manufactures and large trade; is an important railroad center; and is the seat of the Syracuse University (Methodist). It was settled about the end of the 18th century; had its present name given it in 1824; and became a city in 1847. Population (1900), 108,374.

Syr-Daria, or Syr-Darya. See Sir-Daria.

Syria (sir'i-ā). [F. Syrie, G. Syrien, L. Syria, Gr. Συρία, from Συροι, L. Syri, the Syrians.] A country in Asiatic Turkey, extending from the Mediterranean eastward to the Euphrates and the desert of Arabia, and from Egypt northward to about lat. 36° N. Chief city, Damascus. It includes Palestine (in the southwest), Phenicia, etc.; but by some Palestine is regarded as distinct. It is traversed by mountains north and south (Lebanon, Anti-Libanus, etc.). The principal rivers are the Orontes, Litany, and Jordan. The inhabitants are Bedonina, town Arabs, Druses, Maronites, Jacobites, Jews, etc. The ancient inhabitants were Hittites, Arameans, Canaanites, Hebrews, and Phenicians. Syria became subject to Assyria about 733 B. C., and was later under Babylon, Persia, and Macedonia. Part of Syria was conquered by Seleucus Nicator about 300 B. C., and Syria gave its name to the whole realm of the Seleucidae, which had Antioch as its capital, and embraced a great part of the Macedonian conquests in Asia. It was conquered by Pompey about 64 B. C., and annexed to the Roman Empire; was conquered by the Saracens 634-636 A. D.; and belonged to the califate, Seljuk Turks, etc. A Christian kingdom was established in part of it during the Crusades. It was conquered by the Turks in 1516; and was held temporarily by Mehemet Ali of Egypt 1832-41. Massacres of Christians in 1860 led to temporary French occupation. Population, probably from 1,500,000 to 2,000,000.

Syrian Gates, The. A pass between the mountains (ancient Amanus) and the northeastern angle of the Mediterranean, leading from Cilicia to Syria: the modern Pass of Beilan.

Syrinx (si'ringks). In Greek mythology, a nymph who was changed by Pan into a reed.

Syrmia (sēr'mi-ā), G. Syrmien (zir'mē-en). A former duchy, situated in Slavonia, in the eastern part of the peninsula comprised between the Drave, Danube, and Save.

Syro-Phenicia (si'rō-fē-nish'ā). A Roman province which included Phenicia and the territories of Damascus and Palmyra.

Syrophenicians (si'rō-fē-nish'anz). In ancient history, either the Phenicians dwelling in Syria, or persons of mixed Syrian and Phenician descent, or the inhabitants of Syro-Phenicia.

Syros (si'ros). The ancient name of Syra.

Syrtis Major (sēr'tis mā'jor). [L., 'Greater Syrtis.'] The ancient name of the Gulf of Sidra.

Syrtis Minor (sēr'tis mī'nor). [L., 'Lesser Syrtis.'] The ancient name of the Gulf of Gabes.

Syzran (siz-rāny'). A town in the government of Simbirsk, eastern Russia, situated near the Volga 80 miles south of Simbirsk. It has manufactures of leather, etc. Population, 30,580.

Szabod (Hung. so'bod), Emeric. Born in Hungary about 1822. A Hungarian-American author and soldier. He was secretary to the Hungarian revolutionary government in 1849, and served in the American Civil War. He wrote "Hungary," "State Policy of Modern Europe," "Modern War," etc.

Szabadka. See Theresienstadt.

Szechuen, or Sechuen (sā-chō-en'). A province of western China, bounded by Kansu and Shensi on the north, Hupeh and Hunan on the east, Kweichow and Yunnan on the south, and Tibet on the west and northwest. Capital, Chingtu. Area, about 160,000 square miles. Population (1896), estimated, 79,493,000.

Szegedin (seg'ed-ēn). A royal free city, capital of the county of Csongrád, Hungary, situated at the junction of the Maros with the Theiss, in lat. 46° 16' N., long. 20° 10' E. It is the second city of Hungary. It has important trade and various manufactures. It was formerly fortified, and was held by the Turks in the 16th and 17th centuries. It was a seat of the Hungarian revolutionary government in July, 1849. It was nearly destroyed by an inundation of the Theiss in March, 1879. Population (1890), 85,569.

Szegszárd (sek'sárd). The capital of the county of Tolna, Hungary, situated on the Sár-viz, near the Danube, in lat. 46° 23' N. It has a trade in wine. Population (1890), 14,325.

Sziget (sig'et), or Mármaros-Sziget (mār-mo-rosh-sig'et). The capital of the county of Mármaros, Hungary, situated at the junction of the Iza and the Theiss, in lat. 47° 56' N. Near it is a salt-mining region. Population (1890), 14,758.

Szigetvár (sig'et-vār), or Sziget. A town in the county of Somogy, Hungary, situated on the Almás 25 miles south of Kaposvár; noted for its defense under Zrinyi against the Turks in 1566. Population (1890), 5,078.

Taafe (tä'fe), Count Eduard von. Born at Prague, Feb. 24, 1833; died Nov. 29, 1895. An Austrian statesman, of Irish descent. He was governor of Salzburg 1863-67, and of Upper Austria in 1867; entered the Austrian (i. e.isleithan) ministry as minister of the interior in 1867; was premier from Oct., 1869, to Jan., 1870; was minister of the interior 1870-71; became governor of Tyrol in 1871; and was again premier 1879-93.

Taainge (tä'sing-e). An island belonging to the amt of Svendborg, Denmark, situated south of Fünen. Length, 9 miles. Pop. (1880), 4,529.

Tab (täb). A river in western Persia which flows into the head of the Persian Gulf near lat. 30° N.

Tabago. See Tobago.

Tabard (tab'ärd), The. An ancient London hostelry, made famous by Chaucer as the house at which his pilgrims assembled before starting for Canterbury. It was situated on the High Street of Southwark, near the Kent Road. Stow says in 1598 that it was then "amongst the most ancient" of the "fair inns for receipt of travellers." It received its name from its sign, which was a tabard, or sleeveless coat. It was originally the property of the Abbey of Hyde. In 1766 the sign of the tabard (see the extract) was removed as a street obstruction, and in 1866 the inn was condemned, and shortly afterward demolished and a freight depot of the Midland Railway built on the spot.

Up to a few years before its destruction it was marked by an inscription [not ancient] which said "This is the Inn where Sir Jeffrey Chaucer and twenty pilgrims lay in their journey to Canterbury anno 1383." . . . The front towards the street was comparatively modern, having perished in the fire of 1676, after which, says Aubrey, "the ignorant landlord or tenant instead of the ancient sign of the Tabard put up the Tabot or Dog."

Hare, London, I. 402.

Tabaristan (tä-bä-ris-tän'). The mountainous region in the southeast of the province of Mazanderan, Persia.

Tabaristan, Sea of. A medieval name of the Caspian Sea.

Tabariyeh (tä-bä-rē'ye), or Tabariya (tä-bä-rē'yä). The modern name of Tiberias.

Tabasco (tä-bäs'kö). A maritime state of Mexico. Capital, San Juan Bautista. It is bounded by the Gulf of Mexico, the Mexican states of Vera Cruz, Chiapas and Campeche, and Guatemala. The surface is low except in the southern part, and the soil is fertile. Area, 9,544 square miles. Population (1895), 131,794.

Tabatinga (tä-bä-teng'gä). A military post and town in the state of Amazonas, Brazil, situated on the Amazon close to the Peruvian frontier.

Tabernacle. See Salt Lake City.

Tabirä (tä-bē-rä'). [Origin of name doubtful, possibly Piro.] The proper name of the ruined pueblo on the mesa of Jumanos in New Mexico, now called "la gran Quivira." Tabirä was a Franciscan mission in the 17th century, but was abandoned about 1670, on account of the Apaches, at the same time as the village, the inhabitants of which retreated to the south and to the Rio Grande.

Tabitha (tab'i-thä). [LL. Tabitha, Gr. Ταβιθά; an Aramaic name meaning 'a female gazel'; its Gr. translation is Δορκάς.] A Christian woman at Joppa, mentioned in Acts ix. as making garments for the poor; also called Dorcas. She was miraculously restored to life by the apostle Peter.

Tablas (tä'bläs). One of the Philippine Islands, southeast of Mindoro. Length, about 30 miles.

Table (tä'bl). Bay. An arm of the ocean, on the southwestern coast of Cape Colony, South Africa. On it is Cape Town.

Table Diamond, The Great. A famous royal Indian diamond, ranked by Tavernier, who saw it in Goleonda in 1642, as the third in size and quality seen by him. It weighed about 242½ carats. It was then in the hands of a dealer, the king having been obliged to raise money on it. It has disappeared, and it has been suggested that the Russian Table diamond may be a part of it. The latter diamond weighs 68 carats.

Table Mountain, or Tafelberg (tä'fel-berä). A mountain immediately south of Cape Town, South Africa, remarkable for its flattened summit. Height, about 3,500 feet.

Table Mountain. A mountain in Pickens County, in the northwestern part of South Carolina. Height, about 4,000 feet.

Table of Abydos. See the extract.

To the above-named monuments must be added the Table of Abydos. As may be gathered from its name, it came from that site, being brought away by M. Minant, Consul-General of France; it is now in the British Museum. Of all the innumerable Egyptian monuments there is not one that is so famous, nor that less deserves its fame. This time it is Ramses II, who adores his ancestors, and out of the fifty cartouches—besides that of Ramses repeated twenty-eight times—there are now but thirty left, and these are in a state more or less incomplete. Like the Hall of Ancestors, the Table of Abydos gives a list resulting from the artist's choice, the reason of which is also unknown. Another fact that depreciates its value is that we do not possess its commencement. After the Twelfth Dynasty, however, the list passes at once without a break to the Eighteenth.

Mariette, Outlines, p. 104.

[There are two temples at Abydos dedicated to the local divinity: the one built by Seti, the other by Ramses. The same series of kings, twice repeated, without any variation, adorns these buildings. One is the Table described above, the other was discovered comparatively lately. Although in an admirable state of preservation, this Table adds but little to our knowledge. It mentions some new kings, and shows the correct sequence of others, but is far from giving us a connected series of all the kings of Egypt from Menes to Seti I.—Note, p. 105.]

Table Rock. A rocky mass formerly at Niagara Falls, the presence of which is said to have at one time caused a separate fall. Until a part of it fell in June, 1850, it largely overhung the water. Some of it still remains.

Tables, The. In Scottish history, an organization, consisting of members of the privy council and others, which took the lead in opposition to the introduction of episcopacy into Scotland about 1638-39. They were so called from sitting separately or conjointly at the tables in the Parliament House.

Table-talk. A name given to various collections of essays. The most notable works so entitled are those of Luther, of John Selden (published in 1689, after his death, by his amanuensis), of Hazlitt (1821-57), and of Coleridge (published by his son in 1835, and republished in 1880). Dyce published in 1856 "Recollections of the Table Talk of Samuel Rogers"; and Cowper added a poetical dialogue entitled "Table Talk" to a volume of poems published in 1782.

Tablet of Sakkarah. See the extract.

The most interesting, as also the most perfect, monument of this kind is the one that was found during the French excavations at Sakkarah, and which is now in the Gizeh palace. Unlike the others, it is not of rosy origin. It was discovered in the tomb of an Egyptian priest named Tanari, who lived in the days of Ramses II. According to the Egyptian belief, one of the good things reserved for the dead who were deemed worthy of eternal life was to be admitted to the society of their kings, and Tanari is represented as having been received into the august assembly of fifty-eight. Here again in the Tablet of Sakkarah, as before in that of Abydos, is raised the same question: Why these fifty-eight kings more than any others?

Mariette, Outlines, p. 106.

Tabnit (täb'nit). King of Sidon (Phœnicia) in the first part of the 4th century B. C., father of Eshmunazar.

Tabor (tä'bör). [See Taborites.] A town in Bohemia, situated on the Lusehnitz 48 miles south of Prague. It was founded as a stronghold by the Hussites under Ziska in 1419. It gave name to the Taborites. Population (1890), 8,410.

Taillefer (tä-y-fär'). Killed at the battle of Senlac, 1066. A Norman trouvère in the invading army of William of Normandy.

Before the two armies met hand to hand, a juggler or minstrel, known as Taillefer, the Cleaver of Iron, rode forth from the Norman ranks as if to defy the whole force of England in his single person. He craved and obtained the Duke's leave to strike the first blow; he rode forth singing songs of Roland and of Charlemagne—so soon had the name and exploits of the great German become the spoil of the enemy. He threw his sword into the air and caught it again; but he presently showed that he could use warlike weapons for other purposes than for jugglers' tricks of this kind: he pierced one Englishman with his lance, he struck down another with his sword, and then himself fell beneath the blows of their comrades. A bravo of this kind might serve as an omen, it might stir up the spirits of men on either side; but it could in no other way affect the fate of the battle.

Freeman, Norman Conquest of England, III. 319.

Tailors of Tooley Street, The Three. Three tailors of Tooley street, London, referred to by Canning, who wrote a petition to Parliament, beginning "We, the people of England."

Taine (täñ), Hippolyte Adolphe. Born at Vouziers, Ardennes, April 21, 1828; died at Paris, March 5, 1893. A distinguished French historian, philosopher, and critic. He graduated with the highest honors from the Collège Bourbon in Paris, and was admitted in the first rank to the Ecole Normale in 1848. He maintained this high standing throughout his course, and went then as a professor into the provinces. He soon returned to Paris. Anxious to broaden his knowledge of science, he took a three years' course in medicine. In this time he accumulated an extensive fund of information, and wrote a series of articles that brought him into notice. In 1853 he took his doctor's degree before the Faculty of Letters in Paris: as a dissertation he presented the celebrated "Essai sur les fabliaux de La Fontaine." Other essays by Taine are on Livy (1854), on Carlyle (v. "L'Idéalisme anglais," 1864), and on Stuart Mill (v. "Le positivisme anglais," 1864). He composed also a volume of "Essais de critique et d'histoire" (1857), and another entitled "Nouveaux essais de critique et d'histoire" (1865). In 1864 he accepted the chair of aesthetics at the Ecole des Beaux Arts. His course of lectures appeared as "L'Idéal dans l'art" (1867). Other works of the same nature are "Philosophie de l'art" (1865), "id. en Italie" (1866), "id. dans les Pays-Bas" (1868). His personal experiences and impressions about men and things both at home and abroad are related in his "Voyage aux Pyrénées" (1855), "Voyage en Italie" (1866), "Notes sur Paris ou vie et opinions de M. Frédéric-Thomas Gaidoerge" (1867), and "Notes sur l'Angleterre" (1872). Lastly came the series of brilliant works that have chiefly made his reputation. These are "Les philosophes classiques du XIX^e siècle en France" (1856), "Histoire de la littérature anglaise" (1864-65), "De l'intelligence" (1870), and "Les origines de la France contemporaine" (in three parts: "L'Ancien régime," "La révolution," "Le régime moderne" (1875-90)). The University of Oxford conferred upon Taine the honorary degree of LL. D. in 1871, and the French Academy elected him to membership Nov. 14, 1878.

Tainos (ti'nös). [From taini, chiefs (the name which they gave to themselves).] The ancient Indian inhabitants of the island of Haiti. Their number is conjectural, but all accounts agree that the island was very populous. They are described as a race of agriculturists, going nearly naked, and living in small villages; their chiefs had little power, except in war. The island was divided among several tribes or subtribes, inhabiting districts which the Spaniards called provinces. The tribes in the central and eastern districts were more warlike than the others, perhaps from admixture of Carib blood. Those of the northern coast were very friendly to Columbus in 1492, and the subsequent uprisings appear to have been provoked entirely by Spanish cruelty. Wars with the whites and the slavery to which they were reduced soon destroyed the tribes, and their blood is seen only in the mixed races of the Dominican Republic. The few words of their language which have come down to us show that they belonged to the Arawak or Maypure stock.

Tai-ping, or Taeping (ti'ping'), Rebellion. [Chinese, from tai, a form of ta, great, and ping, peace.] The great rebellion inaugurated in southern China in 1850 by one Hung-siu-tsuen, who, calling himself the "Heavenly Prince," pretended that he had a divine mission to overturn the Manchu dynasty and set up a purely native dynasty, to be styled the Tai-ping Chao, or 'Great-peace Dynasty.' As the cue had been imposed (about 1644) upon the Chinese by the Manchus as an outward expression of loyalty to the Tatar dynasty, the Taipings discarded the cue, and hence were styled by the Chinese Ch'ang-nao-tsch, or "long-haired rebels." Hung-siu-tsen also promulgated a kind of spurious Christianity, in which God (Shangti) was known as the "Heavenly Father," and Jesus Christ as the "Heavenly Elder Brother." The insurrection was suppressed about 1864, largely with the aid of the "Ever-victorious Army" under Colonel Gordon, who from that time became known as "Chinese Gordon."

Tale of a Tub, A. 1. A comedy by Ben Jonson, licensed in 1633. Fleay assigns the date of its first performance to 1604, on account of the meter. It was altered just before it was licensed, and was played in this shape in 1634, and printed in the folio edition of 1640.

2. A satire by Swift, written about 1696, but not printed till 1704.

In the wonderful allegory of the "Tale of a Tub," in which the corruptions and failings of the English, Roman, and Presbyterian churches were ridiculed in the persons of Jack, Peter, and Martin, Swift displayed at an early age his exuberant wit and surpassing satirical power.

Tuckerman, Hist. of Prose Fiction, p. 172.

Tale of the Two Brothers, The. See the extract.

In another Egyptian story, called "The Tale of the Two Brothers," a lock of hair from the head of a beautiful damsel is carried to Egypt by the river, and its perfume is so ravishing that the king despatches his scouts throughout the length and breadth of the land, that they may bring to him the owner of this lock of hair. She is found, of course, and she becomes his bride. In these tales we have apparently the germ of Cinderella.

Talfourd (tāl'fōrd), Sir Thomas Noon. Born at Doxey, near Stafford, England, Jan. 26, 1795; died at Stafford, March 13, 1854. An English jurist, dramatic poet, and miscellaneous writer. As member of Parliament he advocated the International Copyright Bill. In 1849 he became judge of the Court of Common Pleas. His best-known work is the classical tragedy "Ion" (produced 1836). His other plays include "Athenian Captive" (1838), "Glencoe" (1840), "The Castilian" (1853). He published also "Life and Letters of Lamb" (1837), "Final Memorials of Charles Lamb" (1849-1850), travels, a history of Greek literature, etc.

Taliesin (tāl'i-sin). A Cymric bard said to have lived in the 6th century. He is said to have been the school-fellow of Gildas at Llanvelthin in Glamorgan, to have been seized by Irish pirates when young, and to have escaped by using his wooden shield for a boat, and floating into the fishing-weir of the son of Urian, who made him his foremost bard. He followed his chief to battle, and sang his victories. The songs are his authentic poems. It is also said that he died in Cardiganshire, and was buried near Aberystwith. Many of the poems handed down as his are of later origin. The "Romance or Book of Taliesin," included in the "Mabinogion," is not older than the 13th century. Rhys connects him with the sun myth. Also Taliesin.

In the last section I spoke of the Sun-god in the person of a mythic judge: we have now to discuss a Welsh story which makes him a great bard and poet bearing the well-known name of Taliesin. It is convenient to follow the long-established custom of speaking of certain Welsh poems as Taliesin's, and of a manuscript of the 13th century in which they are contained as the Book of Taliesin. Those poems represent a school of Welsh bardism, but we know in reality nothing about their authorship; and the personality of Taliesin is as mythic as that of Gwyddion and Merlin, both of whom have also been treated as the authors of Welsh verse. The name, however, of Taliesin, viewed in this light, has an interest far surpassing even that of Merlin. Rhys, Celtic Heathendom, p. 544.

Talisman (tāl'is-man), The. A novel by Sir Walter Scott, published in 1825. The scene is laid in Palestine during the reign of Richard I. of England.

Talma (täl-mä'), François Joseph. Born at Paris, Jan. 15, 1763; died there, Oct. 19, 1826. A famous French tragic actor. He was educated in England, and made his début in the Théâtre Français at Paris in 1787. In the small rôle of Proculus in Voltaire's "Brutus" he first introduced on the French stage the custom of wearing the costume of the period represented in the play. The reform was soon adopted. His first great triumph was in the part of Charles IX., in Chénier's tragedy of that name, in 1789. Among his parts were Othello (Ducis), César, Oreste, Achille, Néron, Cinna, etc. He wrote "Réflexions sur Lekain et sur l'art théâtral" (1825). He was a friend of Napoleon as general, consul, and emperor.

His church known as the Brooklyn Tabernacle was built 1870, burned 1872, rebuilt 1873-74, burned 1888, again rebuilt on a new site, and again burned May, 1894. He has edited the "Christian at Work," "The Advance," "Frank Leslie's Sunday Magazine," etc. Among his works are "Crumbs Swept Up" (1870), "Abominations of Modern Society" (1872), "Around the Tea-Table" (1874), "Mask Torn Off" (1879), "The Brooklyn Tabernacle: a Collection of 104 Sermons" (1884), "The Marriage Ring" (1886), etc.

Talmud (tal'mud). [From Heb. lamad, to learn—study, doctrine.] The monumental work which contains the Jewish traditional or oral laws and regulations of life explanatory of the written law of the Pentateuch as applied to the various and varying conditions and circumstances of life, and developed by logical conclusions, analogies, and combination of passages. To a lesser degree the Talmud contains comments on the historical, poetical, and ethical portions of the Scriptures, in a homiletical spirit. This latter part is called Hagada or Agada (from nagad, to say, make known—narrative, tale), while the former, or legislative, part, which comprises all the rules of life, is called Halacha (from halach, to go, walk—the path or way of life as ruled and governed by the law). The Talmud may be externally divided into the Mishnah and Gemara. The relation of one to the other is that of exposition to thesis. The Mishnah gives a simple statement of a law or precept; the Gemara presents the discussion and debate on it. The authors of the Mishnah are called Tenaim (doctors); they were preceded by the Sopherim (scribes). The activity of the Tenaim began in the time of the Maccabees, and their rules and decisions, nearly 4,000 in number, were codified and arranged according to subjects (see noder Mishnah) by Rabbi Judah I. (patriarch 190-220 A. D.). The authors of the Gemara are called Amoraim (from amar, to say—speakers). The discussions of the Amoraim in the schools of Palestine (especially in Tiberias) were codified in the 3rd century A. D. in the Jerusalem Talmud; the discussions of the Amoraim of the schools of Babylonia were codified in the course of the 5th and 6th centuries A. D. in the Babylonian Talmud. The chief redactors were Rab Ashi, principal of the school of Sora 375-427, and Rabbina, head of the same academy 473-499. The Mishnah is composed in Hebrew ("post-Biblical," or "New Hebrew"), the Gemara mainly in Aramaean. Neither the Jerusalem nor the Babylonian Talmud contains the complete Gemara to the entire Mishnah. But the Babylonian Talmud is about four times as voluminous as that of Jerusalem. The Babylonian Talmud obtained greater popularity and authority among the Jews than that of Jerusalem, and is always meant when the Talmud is spoken of without a qualification. Its 63 tracts are usually printed in 12 folio volumes on 2,947 pages. The Mishnah is besides separately printed in 6 volumes, according to its division into 6 orders or sedarim; and also the portions of the Hagada under the title of Ain Yakob. See Agada, Amoraim, Gemara, Mishnah.

Talos (tä'los). [Gr. Talós.] 1. In Greek legend, an inventor, nephew of Dædalus by whom he was slain. See Dædalus.—2. A man of brass, constructed by Hephestus for Minos to guard the island of Crete.

He made his first appearance at Naples in 1841, and in England in 1850, where he sang with success for twenty-four years. In 1857 he sang in America. His later years were passed in Madrid as a manufacturer of arms.

Tamboff (tä-m-bof'). 1. A government of central Russia, surrounded by the governments of Vladimir, Nijni-Novgorod, Penza, Saratoff, Voronezh, Orel, Tula, and Ryazan. The surface is undulating or level. The chief export is corn. Area, 25,710 square miles. Population (1890), 2,850,800. 2. The capital of the government of Tamboff, situated on the Tsna about lat. 52° 45' N. Population (1890), 40,876.

Tamburlaine (or Tamberlane) the Great, or the Scythian Shepherd and the Scourge of God. A tragedy in two parts, by Marlowe, acted in 1557, and entered on the "Stationers' Register" and printed in 1590. It is his earliest play, and the first in which blank verse was introduced on the public stage. See Tamerlane and Timur.

Mr. C. H. Herford and Mr. A. Wagner have investigated the authorities from which Marlowe drew his conception of Tamburlaine's character and history. They show, at some length, and at the cost of considerable research, that Marlowe was indebted to the lives of Timur by Pedro Mexia the Spaniard and Petrus Peronidinus. Mexia's "Silva de varia lection," published at Seville in 1543, obtained great popularity, and was translated into Italian, French, and English. The English translation, known as Fortescue's "The Forest," appeared in 1571; and there can be little doubt but that the book was an early favourite of Marlowe's. Bullen, Introductio to Marlowe's Works, p. xxii.

The subject of "Tamburlaine" . . . if we would express it in the simplest way, is a mere lust of dominion, the passion of "a mighty hunter before the Lord" (for sovereignty alone, the love of power in its crudest shape. This, and this alone, living and acting in the person of the Scythian shepherd, gives unity to the multitude of scenes which grow up before us and fall away. . . . There is no construction in "Tamburlaine." Instead of two plays there might as well have been twenty, if Marlowe could have found it in his heart to husband his large supply of kings, emperors, souldans, pashas, governors, and viceroys who perish before the Scourge of God, or had he been able to discover empires, provinces, and principalities with which to endow a new race of rulers. The play ends from sheer exhaustion of resources.

Dowden, Transcripts and Studies, p. 44.

Tame (täm). A small river in central England which joins the Trent northeast of Lichfield.

Tamego (tä-mä'gō). A river in northern Portugal and Spain which joins the Douro 20 miles east of Oporto. Length, about 90 miles.

Tamera (tam'e-rä). An ancient name of Lower Egypt.

Tamerlane. See Timur.

Tamerlane (tam-är-län'). A play by Rowe, produced in 1702. Tamerlane, though supposed to be the Timur (Tamburlaine) of Marlowe's play, is made a calm philosophic prince, with poetical allusion to William III., so that it was played for many years on the 4th and 5th of Nov., the anniversaries of the birth and of the landing of William III. Handel composed the music for a libretto by Piovone, called Tamerlano; it was produced in London in 1724.

Tamesis (tam'e-sis). The Latin name of the Thames.

Taming of the Shrew, The. A comedy by Shakspeare, produced in 1603 and printed in 1623; altered from "The Taming of a Shrew" printed in 1594. The earlier play was not by Shakspeare, but by some one else (Marlowe and Kyd have been suggested) for Pembroke's company in 1588-89. The version altered by Shakspeare was by Lodge (Fleay). See Katherine and Petruchio, Clobber of Preston, Rule a Wife and Have a Wife, and The Honey-moon, all of which are more or less based on this play.

Tamise (tā-mēz'). A manufacturing town in the province of East Flanders, Belgium, situated on the Schelde 20 miles north-northwest of Brussels. Population (1890), 11,039.

Tammany Hall (tam'a-ni hāl'). [From the conventional spelling of the name of a sachem of the Delaware Indians who sold land to William Penn. In the aboriginal tongue his name means 'the Affable,' and tradition credits him with being a lover of peace; further than this, the legends and adventures attached to his name are the invention of members of different American societies which held May-day festivals in Maryland and Pennsylvania before and after the Revolution, and, adopting the sachem as their patron saint, commonly described themselves as "Sons of St. Tammany."] A New York political organization, having its headquarters in Tammany Hall, the property of the "Tammany Society or Columbian Order." The latter was founded in New York city on May 12, 1789, with benevolent and fraternal purposes. In general opposition to the Federalists the Tammany Society became identified with the Republicans (now the Democratic party), and took an active part in the campaign of 1800, which resulted in the choice of Thomas Jefferson for President. In 1805 the society was incorporated. While adhering to its original character as a secret social organization, with a governing council of sachems and a ritual with aboriginal flavor, the Tammany Society grew in public influence, and in 1811 built the original Tammany Hall at Frankfort street, fronting the City Hall Park. Since then a local political party, favored by a majority of the members of the Tammany Society, has always had its headquarters in the home of the Society, and has been popularly known as "Tammany Hall"—the present hall, erected in 1867, being on 14th street, between Irving Place and Third Avenue. Although in theory the Tammany Hall General Committee has no relation to the Tammany Society save as tenant of the latter's edifice, in practice they are coordinate branches of one political system, the Society being in effect the citadel of the controlling spirits of the Tammany Hall party. Tammany Hall purports to be the regular Democratic organization of the city and county of New York, though that claim has often been contested. By means of a highly organized system of Tammany clubs and assembly-district associations, it has usually held a paramount place in city politics. In 1893, Tammany Hall, controlled virtually by one man, was in possession of every important office and avenue of public employment pertaining to the municipal administration. It was overthrown 1894, regained power 1897, and was again overthrown 1901.

Tammerfors (tām'mer-fors). A manufacturing town in the government of Tavastehus, Finland, 105 miles north-northwest of Helsingfors. Population (1890), 20,489.

Tammuz (tam'uz). [Heb.] 1. The fourth ecclesiastical and tenth civil month of the Hebrew year. It corresponds to part of June and part of July.—2. A Syrian deity, the same as the Phenician Adon or Adonis, in whose honor a feast was held every year, beginning with the new moon of the month Tammuz. He was identical with the Assyro-Babylonian Du'uzu or Dumuzu. Also Tammuz. See Adonis.

Tam o' Shanter (tam o shan'tēr). A famous poem by Robert Burns.

Tamoyos (tā-mō'yōs). [Tupi tamuya, a grandfather or ancestor; hence 'the ancient.'] A powerful tribe of Indians who at the time of the conquest dominated the Brazilian coast from Cape Frio to Ubatuba (Rio de Janeiro and São Paulo). They were a branch of the great Tupi stock. They repeatedly attacked the Portuguese settlements of São Vicente and Santos, and by their alliance with the French colonists at Rio de Janeiro enabled the latter to maintain their position until 1567. As a tribe they have long been extinct.

Tanagra (tan'a-grā). In ancient geography, a town of Boeotia, Greece, situated near the Asopus 24 miles north-northwest of Athens. A victory was gained here, in 457 B. C., by the Spartans over the Athenians and their allies. Its extensive necropolis has made this obscure town famous, for from it came about 1874 the first of the terra-cotta figurines which drew attention to the interest and charm of antiquities of this class. Such figurines, previously ignored, have since been eagerly sought and found in great quantities, not only at Tanagra, but upon a great number of sites in all parts of the Greek world. Those from Tanagra, despite ancient animadversions on Boeotian taste, still hold the palm for elegance and artistic quality.

Tanaim (tā-nā'im), or Tanaites. Tannhäuser (tān'hoi-zer). [MIG. Der Tannhäuser.] A Middle High German lyric poet of the 13th century. He belonged to the Salzbürg family of Tannhusen. From about 1240 to 1270 he led a wandering life in which he lived at the Bavarian, Austrian, and other courts, and visited the far East. He was a minnesinger and the writer, particularly, of dance-songs. A German ballad of the 16th century has preserved the memory of the historical Tannhäuser. This first describes his parting with Lady Venus, with whom he has been for a year in the Venusberg. He makes a vow of penance to Rome and asks for absolution, but Pope Urban, who holds a dry staff in his hand, declares that as little as the staff can grow green, so little can he have God's mercy. In despair he goes away. On the third day after the staff, however, begins to bud, and the Pope sends out in search of him; but he has gone back to Venus in the mountain. The legend of Tannhäuser is the subject of the opera of the same name by Richard Wagner.

Tannhäuser und der Sängerkrieg auf Wartburg. An opera by Wagner, founded on the legend of Tannhäuser, produced at Dresden in 1845, and in England in 1876.

Tano (tä'nō), or Tahano, or Thano. [From tāno, a Tigua word signifying 'men,' 'Indians,'] A tribal division of the Taíno stock of North American Indians, which formerly occupied a number of pueblos in the vicinity of Galisteo, 20 miles south of Santa Fé, New Mexico. It was almost destroyed as a tribe in the Pueblo revolt of 1680. The remnants are settled with the Tigua and Tewa. See Taínoan.

Taínoan (tä'nō-yō-an), or Enaghmagh. A linguistic stock of North American Indians, which embraces the Tewa, Tano, Tigua, Jemez, and Piro, divisions which speak more or less closely allied dialects and inhabit various communal pueblos or villages in the main and tributary valleys of the Rio Grande, in New Mexico, Texas, and Chihuahua, as well as one of the Tusayan villages, Arizona. Number, 3,300.

Tantalus (tä'n-täl-us). [Gr. Τάνταλος.] In Greek mythology, a son of Zeus and Pluto, and father of Pelops and Niobe; king of Mount Sipylus in Lydia. For revealing the secrets of the gods he was condemned to stand in Tartarus up to his chin in water under a loaded fruit-tree, the fruit and water retreating whenever he sought to satisfy his hunger or thirst. From his name is derived the word tantalize.

Tantra (tä'n-trä). [Skt. 'loom, thread, warp,' and then 'order of rites, theory, treatise,'] In Sanskrit literature, a religious treatise teaching magical formulas for the worship of the gods or the attainment of superhuman power. The Tantras are the Bible of Shaktism (see Shaktas). Like the Puranas, they are sometimes called a fifth Veda. They are also known as Agama, 'that which has come down' (also applied to the Brahmana portion of the Veda), in distinction from Nigama, a general name for the Vedas, Dharmashastras, Puranas, and other Smṛiti literature. Their authorship is sometimes ascribed to Dattatreya, who is worshipped as an incarnation of Brahma, Vishnu, and Shiva; but they are generally thought to have been revealed by Shiva alone. None has as yet been printed or translated in Europe. They are said to number 64, without counting many works of a Tantrik character. They are generally written in the form of a dialogue between Shiva and his wife, and every Tantra ought in theory to treat of five subjects: the creation, the destruction of the world, the worship of the gods, the attainment of superhuman power, and the four modes of union with the Supreme Spirit. Whole Tantras treat only of various modes of using spells for acquiring magical power; others simply describe the most effectual modes of worshipping the Shaktis. The oldest known Tantra cannot antedate the 6th or 7th century A. D. Full as they are of doubtful symbolism, and tending in their teaching to licentiousness, they are not all necessarily impure. They seem connected with a distorted view of the Sankhya philosophy and with some corrupt forms of Buddhism. They have greatly influenced the later Buddhist literature of Nepal. There are also Vaishnava Tantras, such as the Gautamiya and the Sanatsumara; but even in these Shiva is the speaker and his wife the listener. In them Kadha, the wife of Krishna, takes the place of Durga as the chief object of worship.

Taormina (tä-or-mē'nä). A decayed town in the province of Messina, Sicily, situated on the coast 31 miles southwest of Messina: the ancient Tauromenium. It has a castle and a cathedral, and is noted for its antiquities, especially for its very fine theater, of Greek foundation but altered by the Romans. This important ancient city was founded about 396 B. C. It was often besieged and taken. Population (1881), 2,388.

Taos (tä'ōs). The northernmost of the Pueblo tribes of North American Indians, occupying a village of the same name 50 miles northward from Santa Fé, on the Rio de Taos, a tributary of the Rio Grande, in New Mexico. Number, 409. See Tigua.

Tapajos (tä-pä-zhōs'), or Tapajosos (tä-pä-zhō-zōs'). An Indian tribe which, in the 16th and 17th centuries, occupied the territory about the mouth of the river Tapajós. The sites of their villages, which were large and close together, are still marked by great quantities of broken pottery strewn over the ground. The Tapajos were probably of Tupi race. Many of them were enslaved; others were gathered into missions, and their descendants form part of the peasant population of the same region.

Tapajós (tä-pä-zhōs'). A river in the states of Mato Grosso and Pará, Brazil. It is one of the principal southern tributaries of the Amazon, which it joins near long. 54° 35' W. The main head streams are the Arinos (which rises near the source of the Paraguary) and the Juruna. Length, with the Arinos, nearly 1,100 miles; navigable by steamboats to Itaituba, 150 miles; above this there are numerous rapids, but canoes ascend nearly to the source of the Arinos. Also written Tapajoz.

Tapanees. See Tapanecs.

Tapes (tä-päs'). Indians of the Guarany race who formerly occupied much of the territory between the rivers Paraná and Uruguay, extending eastward nearly to the Atlantic. Like the Guaranyes proper they had hardly any tribal organization, and probably the name itself was loosely used. The Jesuits had some of their largest missions among these Indians. Descendants of the Tapes form a large portion of the country population of Corrientes and Misiones, part of Entre Rios, northern Uruguay, and southern Rio Grande do Sul. See Guaranyes.

Taphiæ (tä'fī-ē). [Gr. Ταφίον νήσοι.] In ancient geography, a group of islands west of Acarnania, Greece, corresponding to the modern Meganisi, Kalamo, etc.; earlier called Teleboides.

Tarascons (tä-räs'kōs), or Tarascons (tä-räs'känz). An Indian race of Mexico, formerly a powerful nation which occupied the territory now included in the state of Michoacan. According to tradition they came from the north about the time of the Aztec migration, establishing their capital at Tzi-zontzont on the Lake of Patzenaro. Their language was entirely distinct from the Nahuatl, forming in itself a linguistic stock. They were quite as far advanced in civilization as the Aztecs, building temples and houses of cut stone, weaving cotton for clothing, and using a very complete defensive armor in war; their calendar was similar to that of the Mexicans, and they had a form of picture-writing, no specimen of which has been preserved. Human sacrifices were made to their gods and at funerals. Their chief deity was Curicaueri, said to have symbolized the sun. Their chiefs (called kings by the Spaniards) were elected and had considerable power. The Tarascos were frequently at war with the Aztecs, and were never conquered by them. They submitted without resistance to the Spaniards; but, notwithstanding this, Nuño de Guzman tortured and killed their last king, Tangaxoan. Under Hidalgo they were the first to revolt against the Spaniards in 1810, thus opening the war for independence, in which they fought bravely. About 275,000 Tarascos survive, principally in Michoacan, with outlying villages in Guerrero and Jalisco.

They developed out of the oral translations and paraphrases of the passages of Scripture read in the synagogues; a custom which probably began soon after the return of the Jews from the captivity. The most popular Targum is that which passes under the name of Onkelos, which originated probably in the 3d century A. D. in Babylonia; the name is supposed to be a corruption of Aquila (Akylos), the celebrated convert and author of a Greek version of the Old Testament, to whom it was ascribed. It gives in general a faithful translation of the Hebrew text. Another Targum is attributed to Jonathan ben Uzziel, a disciple of Hillel, which is more free in its rendering of the original; while the so-called Jerusalem Targum ('pseudo-Jonathan') is more of a homiletical paraphrase than a translation. None of these Targums is in its present shape a complete translation of the Old Testament.

Tarifa (tä-rö'fä). A seaport and fishing town in the province of Cadiz, Spain, situated on the Strait of Gibraltar in lat. 36° S.; the Punic Jews and Roman Julia Traducta. It occupies the southernmost point of the continent of Europe. The Saracens under Tarik landed there in 711. It was taken by the Castilians in the end of the 13th century and was defended by the British in 1812. Population (1887), 13,206.

The capital of the department of Tarija, 200 miles south-southeast of Sucre. Population, about 10,000.

Tarik (tä'rik). Lived in the first part of the 8th century. A Saracen general. As subordinate of Musa, the governor of North Africa, he led the invasion of Spain; landed at Gibraltar; defeated Roderick near Xerez de la Frontera in 711; and conquered Cordova, Toledo, etc. He aroused the jealousy of Musa, and was overthrown by him in 712.

Tarim (tä-röm'). A river of Eastern Turkestan, Chinese empire, which flows easterly into Lake Lob Nor. It is supposed to receive the Aksu, Khoten, etc. Length, estimated, over 1,000 miles.

Tarkhan (tär-ähän'), Cape. A cape at the western extremity of the Crimea, Russia.

Tarleton (tär'lö'ton), Sir Banastre. Born at Liverpool, Aug. 21, 1754; died Jan. 23, 1833. An English general, notorious in the Revolution for his cruelty as a partisan commander in the Carolinas (1780-81). He organized the "British Legion" of regulars and Tories; served at Camden; defeated Sumter at Fishing Creek and was defeated by him at Blackstock's Hill Nov. 20, 1780. He was defeated by Morgan at the Cowpens in Jan., 1781; and surrendered with Cornwallis at Yorktown. He was later member of Parliament and lieutenant-general. He wrote a "History of the Campaigns of 1780-81, etc." (1787).

Tarleton (tär'lö'ton), Richard. Died at London, 1588. A famous clown and comic actor. He is said to have been brought to London from Shropshire, and to have been a "prentice in his youth" of the city of London, later a "water-bearer." He was enrolled afterward as one of the twelve of the Queen's Company, and became a kind of court jester as well. He was celebrated for his extemporaneous rimes and for his "jigs" (comic songs with a dance), which he invented. His popularity and audacity were both unbounded. He fell into disgrace and was dismissed from court for scurrilous reflections upon Leicester and Raleigh. He then kept a tavern in Paternoster Row, and later the Tabler in Gracechurch street. He wrote "The Seven Deadly Sins," a play which appears to have been the result of his real or pretended repentance of his irregularities.

Tarma (tär'mä). A colonial intendency of Peru, corresponding, nearly, to the present department of Junin (which see).

Tarn (tärn). A river in southern France which joins the Garonne below Moissac; the Roman Tarnis. A gorge or cañon, 31 miles long, in its upper course, is remarkable for the height of the rocks. Among its tributaries are the Aveyron and the Agout. Length, about 235 miles.

Tarn. A department of France, formed from part of the ancient Languedoc. Capital, Albi. It is bounded by Tarn-et-Garonne on the northwest, Aveyron on the north and east, Hérault on the southeast, Aude on the south, and Haute-Garonne on the west. The surface is generally hilly or mountainous (containing part of the Cévennes). Area, 2,217 square miles. Population (1891), 346,739.

Taro (tä'rö). A small river in the province of Parma, Italy, which joins the Po 14 miles north-northwest of Parma.

Tarpeia (tär-pé'yä). In Roman legend, the daughter of Spurius Tarpeius, governor of the citadel of Rome on the Capitoline Hill. Tempted by offers of the golden bracelets and collars of the Sabines, she betrayed the fortress to them; but as they entered they cast their shields upon her, and she was crushed to death. From her the Tarpeian Rock was named.

Tarpeian Rock (tär-pé'yan rok). [L. Mons Tarpeius.] Originally, the name of the entire Capitoline Hill in Rome, or at least of the peak occupied by the citadel, in memory of the treason of the maid Tarpeia in connection with the Sabine siege; later, that part (Rupes Tarpeia) of the cliff of the Capitoline above the Vicus Jugarius and the Forum Romanum, over whose precipice condemned criminals were hurled; now unrecognizable owing to artificial and natural changes in the rocks. The popular identification as the Tarpeian Rock of a portion of the Capitoline cliff which is cut to a vertical surface, and with a deep vertical channel, above the Vicolo della Rupe Tarpeia, is incorrect.

Tarquin (tär'kwín). See Tarquinius.

Tarquinius (tär'kwín'i-i). In ancient geography, a city of Etruria, situated near the Mediterranean and near the modern Corneto, 45 miles northwest of Rome. It was one of the chief cities of the Etruscan League, the original residence of Tarquinius Priscus in Roman legend. It was often at war with Rome, especially in the 4th century B. C.

Tarquinius Priscus (tär'kwín'i-i pris'kus). [L. priscus, old, original.] In Roman legendary history, the fifth king of Rome; the son of a Greek colonist in Tarquinii. He settled in Rome, became guardian of the sons of Ancus Marcius, and succeeded the latter. He is said to have built the Cloaca, the Circus Maximus, and the Capitoline Temple. The traditional date of his reign is 616-578 B. C.

Tarquinius Sextus. See Sextus.

Tarquinius Superbus (sä-pér'bus). [L. superbus, haughty.] In Roman legendary history, the seventh and last king of Rome; son of Tarquinius Priscus, and son-in-law of Servius Tullius whom he put to death and succeeded. He extended Roman influence abroad, but is represented as a despot and tyrant, and as overthrown through the crime of his son Sextus. Unsuccessful attempts were made to restore him through the Etruscans and others. The traditional date of his reign is 534-510 B. C.

Tarracina (tar-a-si'nä), or Anxur (anks'ür). In ancient geography, a city of Latium, Italy, situated on the Mediterranean 57 miles southeast of Rome; the modern Terracina. A Volscian town, it was later in possession of Rome.

Tarragona (tär-rä-gö'nä). 1. A province in northeastern Spain. It is bounded by the Mediterranean and the provinces of Barcelona, Lerida, Saragossa, Teruel, and Castellon. It corresponds to part of the ancient Catalonia. The surface is partly mountainous. Area, 2,451 square miles. Population (1887), 348,579.

2. A seaport, capital of the province of Tarragona, situated at the mouth of the Francoli, on the Mediterranean, in lat. 41° 6' N., long. 1° 15' E.; the ancient Tarraco. It has a growing commerce, exporting wine, oil, etc. The interior of the cathedral is of French early Pointed work; the fine west door and rose and the geometrical tracery of the chapels lend a later character to the exterior. The old city walls are of high interest. Their base is of rude cyclopean work, prehistoric, with stones unshaped, and still higher up more modern masonry. There is much pre-Roman masonry, in very large blocks, both in the fortifications and within the city. There are remains of a Roman aqueduct, of 11 arches in the lower tier and 25 in the upper. Its length is 742 feet; its height is 96 feet. The margin-drafted masonry is very solid and imposing. This town was a Phœnician settlement; was fortified by the Scipios; became one of the leading cities of Spain, and the capital of Hispania Tarraconensis; was sacked by the West Goths in the 5th century, and by the Saracens in the 8th; and was rebuilt in the 12th century. It was captured by the British in 1705, and by the French under Subeet in 1811. Population (1887), 27,225.

Tasso (tä'sö; It. pron. täs'sö), Bernardo. Born at Venice, Nov. 11, 1493; died at Ostiglia, Sept. 4, 1569. An Italian poet, father of Torquato Tasso. His chief work is the romantic poem "L'Amadigi" ("Amadis," 1560), in octave stanzas.

Tasso, Torquato. [F. Le Tasse.] Born at Sorrento, Italy, March 11, 1544; died at Rome, April 25, 1595. A celebrated Italian poet. He was educated at the Jesuit schools at Naples, Rome, and Bergamo. His father, Bernardo Tasso, was involved in the troubles of the Prince of Salerno, his patron, and joined the prince in Rome; but, that city becoming unsafe for him, he accepted shelter at Pesaro, the court of the Duke of Urbino, where his son Torquato was taught with the son of the duke. In 1557 Torquato went to study law at Padua. He was influenced by his father's writings and not by his advice, and in 1562, while still at Padua, published "Rinaldo." It was successful, and, his father ceasing his opposition to a literary career, Tasso went to Bologna to study philosophy and literature. He returned to Padua shortly after, and by 1565 was attached to the service of the house of Este, the glories of which he celebrated in "Jerusalem Delivered"; Rinaldo was said to be of that race. He was well received at court, and was encouraged to finish the epic "Goffredo" (later called "Gerusalemme Liberata"), which he had begun at Bologna. In 1570 Cardinal Luigi d'Este, his patron, went to Paris, taking Tasso with him. There he met Ronsard and other distinguished men. He left the cardinal after his return on account of a difference in religious opinion, but was received by Duke Alfonso of Ferrara, who loaded him with favors. He produced his "Aminta" in 1573, and had written 18 cantos of "Goffredo" in 1574, when he was seized with fever. After this his mind was not clear: he became quarrelsome, worried himself about the orthodoxy of his poem, and became subject to delusions, dreading accusations of heresy and assassination or poison. At length he was placed in a convent at Ferrara for medical treatment. He escaped and fled to his sister in the disguise of a shepherd. She cared for him, and in 1578 the duke received him again; but his delusions continued, and he wandered from place to place (to Mantua, Turin, etc.), finally returning to Ferrara. There he became so violent in accusing the duke of a design to poison him that he was placed in an insane asylum. After he had remained there for seven years he was released, on the personal promise of the Prince of Mantua that Alfonso should not again be exposed to his insane attacks. A theory has obtained credit that Tasso was shot up in an asylum on account of his aspirations for the hand of Leonora d'Este, the duke's sister, and Goethe's play was based on this supposition. "Goffredo" was published at Venice during the time of Tasso's seclusion, but it was very inaccurately printed, and in 1581 a revised edition was printed at Parma, with its present title "Gerusalemme Liberata" ("Jerusalem Delivered"). He remained a year at Mantua, wrote "Torrismondo" (1586), and again resumed his wanderings. He had many friends eager to help him, but was broken in health and spirits. His "Gerusalemme Conquistata," much inferior to the "Gerusalemme Liberata," was published in 1593. Two years later he died at Rome, whither he had been summoned by Pope Clement VIII. to be crowned poet laureate: the ceremony was never performed, owing to his illness. The "Gerusalemme Liberata" has been translated into many languages. The most famous English translation is that of Fairfax (1600).

Tasso (tä's'sö), Torquato. A tragedy by Goethe, printed in 1790.

Tassoni (tä-sö'nö), Alessandro. Born at Modena, Italy, 1565; died there, 1635. An Italian poet and author. His best-known work is a burlesque heroic poem, "La secchia rapita" ("Rape of the Bucket," 1622). He also wrote "Considerazioni sopra il Petrarca" (1609), etc.

Tatars (tä'tärz), or Tartars (tär'tärz). [From Pers. Tatar, Chinese Tahtar, a Tatar. Tartar, probably due to some confusion with Tartarus, was formerly the established form, and is still frequently used.] 1. Certain Tungusic tribes whose original home was in the region vaguely known as Chinese Tatar (Manchuria and Mongolia), and who are now represented by the Fishshiu Tatars in northern Manchuria, and the Solons and Daurians in northeastern Mongolia, but more particularly by the Manchus (the present rulers of China). The chief among these tribes were (a) the Khitans, who in 907 conquered China and set up a dynasty there (called the Liao) which lasted until 1123, when they were conquered by their rivals; (b) the Nijchi, Juchi, or Jurchin (the true Tatars, and the ancestors of the modern Manchus), who also established a dynasty, called Kin ("golden"), and are hence known as the Kin Tatars; (c) the Kara-Khitai (or black Tatars), a remnant of the Khitans who, when their empire was overthrown by the Juchi, escaped westward and founded an empire which stretched from the Oxus to the desert of Shamo, and from Tibet to the Altai; (d) the Uiguts (or white Tatars).

2. In the middle ages, the host of Mongol, Turk, and Tatar warriors who swept over Asia under the leadership of Jenghiz Khan, and threatened Europe.—3. Numerous tribes or peoples of mixed Turkish, Mongol, and Tatar origin (descendants of the remnants of these hosts) now inhabiting the steppes of central Asia, Russia in Europe, Siberia (the latter with an additional intermixture of Finnish and Samoyedic blood), and the Caucasus, such as the Kazan Tatars (the remnant of the Kiptchaks, or "Golden Horde"), the Crim Tatars in the Crimea, the Kalmucks or Eleuths (who are properly Mongols), etc.

Tatary (tä'tä-ri), more frequently Tartary (tär'tä-ri). A name formerly given to central Asia, on account of the inroads of Tatar hordes in the middle ages. It was later sometimes divided in part into Chinese Tatar (East Turkestan) and Independent Tatar (Turkestan). The name has also often been extended to include Manchuria, Mongolia, and Europe westward to the Dnieper or Don. Hence the division into European and Asiatic Tatar.

Tatary, Chinese. See Tatary.

Tatary, Crim. See Crimea.

Tatary, Gulf or Sound of. An arm of the sea which separates Saghalin from the mainland of Siberia, north of the Sea of Japan.

Teague (tēg). [So called from the former prevalence of Teague as an Irish name.] A nickname for an Irishman.

Teague (tēg). A character in Howard's play "The Committee." He is a faithful Irishman, a character said by Bibbin to have been copied from Howard's own Irish servant. "Teague" became a half-contentious name for an Irishman in the 17th-century plays and novels; it appears in the famous ballad "Lillibulero."

Teapi, or Teapy. See Easter Island.

Tearless Battle. A battle, 367 B. C., between the allied Areadians and Argives on one side and the Spartans on the other: so called from the immunity from loss of the Spartans.

Tears of the Muses. A poem by Edmund Spenser.

Tea Water Spring. A famous spring in New York, which issued from the ground in a hollow near what is now the junction of Chatham and Roosevelt streets, then out of town. The water was the best on the island of Manhattan about the beginning of the 18th century, and was highly prized by housewives for making tea. Before the Revolution the old spring was a popular resort. A pump was erected, ornamental grounds were laid out, and the wealth and fashion of the city gathered there on summer evenings to sip the water, fortified by other beverages.

Teazle (tē'z'l), Lady. A gay and innocent but imprudent country-bred girl in Sheridan's "School for Scandal." Married to an old man, she plunges into the temptations of town life. Mrs. Abington, the creator of the part, made her an entirely affected fine lady, giving no hint of her rustic origin. Mrs. Jordan was the first who allowed a trace of country breeding to be visible through the glitter of her artificial town manner.

When the veterans in the art of scandal are joined by a brilliant and mischievous recruit in the shape of Lady Teazle, rushing in amongst them in pure grâce du cœur, the energy of her young onslaught outdoes them all. The talk has never been so brilliant, never so pitiless, as when she joins them. She adds the gift of mimicry to all their malice. Mrs. Oliphant, Sheridan.

Teazle, Sir Peter. The husband of Lady Teazle in Sheridan's "School for Scandal." He is "something of a curmudgeon" in the first act, but improves on acquaintance, and secures the affection of his young wife at the crisis of the play.

Teb, El. See El Teb.

Tebessa (tā-bes'sā). A town in the province of Constantine, Algeria, 108 miles southeast of Constantine: the ancient Thereste. It has important Roman antiquities, including: (a) A Roman basilica, in plan 71 by 212 feet, with nave and two aisles, and a semicircular apse at the further end. The basilica is preceded by an atrium, or open court, surrounded by arcades. The building stands in a large walled enclosure of later date, strengthened by towers. The structure is assigned to the beginning of the 2d century A. D., and though it served long as a Christian church, underwent but little alteration. (b) A temple of Jupiter: a prostyle, tetrastyle, Corinthian building, measuring 26 by 45 feet, on a basement 12 feet high, with a fine flight of steps in front. (c) A triumphal arch of Caracalla: a four-way arch like that of Janus Quadrifrons at Rome and the Roman arch at Tripoli. It is shown by inscriptions to have been founded about 211 A. D.

Tebeth (te-bet'). [Heb.; in Assyrian tebetu, interpreted to signify 'the muddy month.'] The tenth ecclesiastical and the fourth civil month in the Hebrew year, corresponding to February-March (Esther ii. 16).

Teck (tek). A small medieval duchy in Swabia, now belonging to Würtemberg.

Tecpan (tāk-pān'). An old province of Mexico, established by Morelos in 1811 as a revolutionary measure, but retained after the independence. It corresponded, nearly, to the state of Guerrero, which was formed from it in 1847.

Tecpanecs. See Tepanecs.

Tecumseh (te-kum'se). Born near the site of Springfield, Ohio, about 1768; killed in the battle of the Thames, Canada, Oct. 5, 1813. A chief of the Shawnee Indians. Healed his brother ("the Prophet") in his attempt to unite the western Indians against the whites, and was an important ally of the British in the War of 1812. He served at the Raisin River and at Mungua; commanded an Indian contingent at the siege of Fort Meigs; and commanded the right wing at the battle of the Thames.

Tecumseh. A town in Lenawee County, Michigan, situated on the Raisin River 41 miles west-southwest of Detroit. Population (1890), 2,310.

Tecumseh. An iron-clad vessel, a single-turreted monitor, of the United States navy. It was one of Admiral Farragut's fleet in the attack on Mobile, Alabama, commanded by Captain Craven, and was sunk by a torpedo in Mobile Bay Aug. 5, 1864.

Tecunas. See Tucunas and Jumanas.

Teddington (ted'ing-ton). A village in Middlesex, England, situated near the Thames 12 miles west-southwest of London. Population (1891), 10,025.

Te Deum (tē dē'num). [So called from the first words, "Te Deum laudamus," 'Thee, God, we praise.'] An ancient hymn, in the form of a psalm, sung at matins or morning prayer in the Roman Catholic and in the Anglican churches, and also separately as a service of thanksgiving on special occasions. The Te Deum is first mentioned early in the 6th century. Its authorship is popularly attributed to St. Ambrose and St. Augustine, but it probably assumed nearly its present form in the 4th century, during the Arian and Macedonian controversies, though in substance it seems to be still older. St. Cyprian in A. D. 252 using words closely similar to the seventh, eighth, and ninth verses, and several of the latter verses ("Day by day," etc.) agreeing with part of an ancient Greek hymn, preserved in the Alexandrine Codex, the beginning of which is a form of the Gloria in Excelsis. Originally it was modeled on the preface and great intercession of a primitive liturgy, probably African, of the type of the liturgy of St. James. Also, more fully, Te Deum Laudamus.

Tees (tēz). A river in northern England which forms the boundary between York and Durham. It flows into the North Sea. Length, 70 miles; navigable for small vessels to Stockton.

Teewah. See Tigna.

Teffé (tef-fā'). A southern tributary of the Amazon, which it joins about long. 64° 40' W.

Teffé, formerly Ega (ā'gā). A town of the state of Amazonas, Brazil, on a lake at the mouth of the river Teffé. It was originally a Jesuit mission, and is now the chief commercial town between Manaus and Tabatinga. Population, about 8,000.

Tegea (tē'jē-ā). [Gr. Tegea.] In ancient geography, a city in Arcadia, Greece, in lat. 37° 28' N., long. 22° 26' E. It fought in the battle of Plataea 479 B. C., and sided with Sparta in the Peloponnesian and Corinthian wars; was later a member of the Achaean Confederacy; fought against Sparta at Mantinea 362 B. C.; and was a member of the Ætolian and Achaean leagues. It contained a famous temple of Athene Achaia, burned about 394 B. C., and restored by Scopas. It was a Doric peripteros of 6 by 13 columns, measuring 72 by 154 feet. The columns within the cella were Ionic and Corinthian. The sculptures of the eastern pediment represented the slaying of the Calydonian boar; those of the western, the combat of Telephus and Achilles.

Tegel (tā'gel). A village and popular resort, situated on the Tegeler See 7 miles northwest of Berlin.

Tegernsee (tā'gern-zā). A lake in Upper Bavaria, situated near the Alps 29 miles south of Munich; noted for its beautiful scenery. Its outlet is by the Mangfall to the Inn. Length, nearly 4 miles. Elevation 2,400 feet.

Tegetthoff (te'get-hot), Baron Wilhelm von. Born at Marburg, Styria, Dec. 23, 1827; died at Vienna, April 7, 1871. An Austrian admiral. He commanded the Austrian contingent in the allied naval victory over the Danes near Heligoland May 9, 1864; and is especially noted for his victory near Lissa over the Italian fleet under Persano, July 20, 1866.

Tegner (te'ng-nār'), Esaias. Born in Kyrkerud, in Wernmland, Sweden, Nov. 13, 1782; died at Wexiö, Nov. 2, 1846. A Swedish poet. He was the son of a clergyman; both parents were from the peasant class. He was in his tenth year when his father died and left the family in extremely poor circumstances. Friends enabled him to obtain his early education, and in 1799 he went as a student to Lund. The following year, from lack of means to continue his studies, he became a tutor in Småland, but subsequently returned to Lund, where he finally took his examination in 1802. In 1803 he was appointed docent in esthetics; ten years later he was made professor of Greek and prebendary. In 1824 he was elected bishop of Wexiö. Subsequently he was afflicted with a hereditary mental disease, and from the autumn of 1840 until the following spring he was in an asylum in Schleswig. He then resumed the duties of his office, but never recovered his health. His literary career began in 1808 with the "Krigssång för det Skånska landvärdet" ("War Song for the Militia of Scania"). In 1811 he was awarded the prize of the Academy for the long poem "Svea" (the poetical name of Sweden). The idyl "Nattvardsbarnen" ("The Children of the Lord's Supper") appeared in 1820; this was followed two years later by the narrative poem "Axel." In 1825 appeared in its complete form the cycle of romances, based upon the Old Norse saga of the same name, the "Frithjofs Saga," his most celebrated work and one of the most famous in Scandinavian literature. He wrote numerous shorter poems, among them "Karl XII." ("Charles XII.") and "Sång till solen" ("Hymn to the Sun"). The longer poems "Gerda" and "Krowbruden" were left unfinished. His last poem, written a short time before his death, is "Åfsked till min lyra" ("Farewell to My Lyre"). He was the principal poet of the so-called Gothic school. His collected works were published at Stockholm, 1876, in 2 vols. His posthumous works appeared at Stockholm, 1873-74, in 3 vols.

Tegnum (teg'num). See the extract.

His [Galeni's] greatest medical works were the treatise, in seventeen books, "on the use of the parts of the human body"; the essay "on the art of medicine," which was the text-book and chief subject of examination for medical students in the middle ages, when it was known in barbarous Latin as the Teopium or Microtegium (Microtegium) of Galen; the fourteen books "on therapeutic method," known in the middle ages as his Megaltegium, in which he defends his own doctrine or Hippocratic system against the Empirics and Methodics; the ten books "on the composition of medicines according to the places," which contained the pharmacopœia of Aretæus, and which is a text-book with the Arabic physicians under the name Miranir, or 'the book of ten treatises.' K. O. Muller, Hist. of the Lit. of Anc. Greece, III. 274 (Donaldson).

Tegua. See Teua.

Tegucigalpa (tā-gū-thē-gāl'pā). The capital (since 1880) of Honduras, Central America, about lat. 14° 10' N. It contains a cathedral and a university. Population, about 15,000.

Tehama (tā-hā'mā). A comparatively low-lying region on the western coast of Arabia.

Teheran (teh-e-rān'), or Tehran (teh-rān'). The capital of Persia, situated about lat. 35° 41' N., long. 51° 25' E. It became the royal residence about the end of the 18th century. Population, estimated, 210,000.

Tehri (teh-rē'). A native state in Bundelkhand, India, intersected by lat. 25° N., long. 79° E. Area, about 2,000 square miles. Population (1881), 311,514.

Tehua. See Teua.

Tehuacan (tā-wā-kān'). A town in the state of Puebla, Mexico, 125 miles east-southeast of Mexico. Population (1894), 6,223.

Tehuantepec (ta-wān-tā-pek'). A town in the southeastern part of the state of Oajaca, Mexico, on the Tehuantepec River, 13 miles from its mouth in the Pacific. It was an ancient city, and at one time the capital of the Zapotec Indians; but, according to tradition, it existed before their time, having been settled by a mythical race, the Huabi, who are said to have come from the south by sea. At the time of the Spanish conquest it belonged to a branch of the Zapotecs; its chief or "king," Cociyopi, submitted to the Spaniards in 1522. Population (1894), 6,674.

Tehuantepec, Gulf of. An arm of the Pacific Ocean, on the southern coast of Mexico at the Isthmus of Tehuantepec.

Tehuantepec, Isthmus of. An isthmus in southeastern Mexico, between the Bay of Campeche on the north and the Gulf of Tehuantepec on the south. Width at the narrowest part, about 120 miles. The mountain lands are here somewhat interrupted, and there are several passes below 900 feet. A railway crosses it, and a canal and a ship-railway have been projected.

Tehuelches. See Patagonians.

Teian (tē'an) Muse, The. A name given to Anacreon, from his birthplace in Teos, Asia Minor.

Teignmouth (tān'muth). A seaport and watering-place in Devonshire, England, situated at the entrance of the Teign into the English Channel, 13 miles south of Exeter. Population (1891), 8,292.

Teith (tēth). A small river chiefly in Perthshire, Scotland, which joins the Forth near Stirling.

Teixeira (tā-shā'rā), Pedro. Born in Portugal about 1575; died at Pará, Brazil, June 4, 1640. A Portuguese soldier. He served in Brazil, taking part in the recovery of Maranhão from the French 1614, and the founding of Pará 1615. In 1620-21 he was governor of Pará. In 1637 he was placed in command of a powerful expedition which ascended the Amazon and Napo and crossed the mountains to Quito, returning by the same route and arriving at Pará Dec. 12, 1639. This was the first careful exploration of the Amazon, and had important results: an account of it was published by Acuña (See that name.) Teixeira was again governor of Pará from Feb. 28, 1640, until a few days before his death. Often written Teixera or Teeyra.

Teja (tē'jā), or Tejas (tē'jās). Killed Sept., 553. The last king of the East Goths in Italy, successor to Totila July, 553. He was slain in the battle on Mount Lactarius.

Tejada, Lardo de. See Lardo de Tejada.

Tejal (tā-yāl' or tē'jāl). [Ar. teḥ yāh.] An Arabic name, of uncertain meaning, for the two stars η and μ Gemminorum. The former, a double variable star, usually of the fourth magnitude, is Tejal prior, and the latter, of the third magnitude, is Tejal post. The first-named star is also known as Proopus (which see).

Tejano. See Cadmittecan.

Tejend (te-jend'). The name given to the lower course of the river Heri-kud, partly on the boundary between Persia and Asiatic Russia.

Tejo. The Portuguese name of the Tagus.

Tekele. See Takala.

Tekes (tek'es). A head stream of the river Ili. Tekke-Turcomans (tek'ke-tür'kō-manz). A race of Tatar nomads in central Asia, on the frontiers of Persia, Afghanistan, and Asiatic Russia. Their power was broken by the Russians under Skobelev at Geok-Tepe in 1881. Merv was taken by the Russians in 1884.

Tekna (tek'nā). A region south of Morocco. Tel-Abib (tel-ā'hēb). [In the Assyrian inscriptions Tel Abubi, hill of the deluge.] A city on the canal of Kebar, in Babylonia, where many of the Jewish exiles were settled, amongst whom was the prophet Ezekiel.

Telamon (tel'n-mon). In Greek legend, son of Ææus, brother of Pelæus, and father of Ajax.

He took part in the Calydonian hunt and the Argonautic expedition, and accompanied Hercules against Laomedon of Troy.

Telamon. In ancient geography, a place on the coast of Etruria, Italy, about 76 miles northwest of Rome. Near here, in 225 B. C., the Romans nearly annihilated an army of Gauls.

Telde (tel'dä). A town in the island of Gran Canaria, Canary Islands.

Tel- (or Tell-) Defenneh (tel-dä-fen'ne). See the extract.

Tell Defenneh is a large mound, or group of mounds, situated close to Lake Menzaleh, at the extreme northeastern corner of the Delta; and the name of this group of mounds, "Defenneh," is a corrupt Arab version of "Daphne," the "Daphne of Pelusium" of the Greek historians. The identity of Defenneh and Daphne has never been questioned by scholars, and the identity of both with the Biblical Tahpanhes has also been admitted by the majority of Bible commentators. Here Mr. Petrie discovered the ruins of "Pharaoh's House at Tahpanhes." Edwards, Pharaohs, Fellahs, etc., p. 58.

Telegonia (tel-e-gō'ni-ä), or Lay of Telegonus. A cyclic poem by Eugamon of Cyrene (about 566 B. C.). It was a continuation of the Odyssey, and was named from its hero Telegonus, son of Odysseus and Circe, who slew his father. The poem completed the "Trojan cycle."

Telegonus (te-leg'ō-nus). [Gr. Τηλέγονος.] In Greek legend: (a) A son of Proteus, slain by Hercules. (b) A son of Odysseus and Circe. He was sent by his mother to Ithaca, where he killed Odysseus and whence he returned to Circe with Telemachus and Penelope; the latter he married. He was said to have been the founder of Tusculum and Preneste.

Tel- (or Tell-) el-Amarna (tel-el-ä-mär'nä). The ruins of a residence of Amenophis IV., in central Egypt. In the winter of 1887-88 there were discovered there about three hundred clay tablets covered with cuneiform inscriptions which have since been deciphered; they contain the diplomatic correspondence of kings of Babylonia, Assyria, and other countries of western Asia, including Palestine, with the Egyptian court.

Tel- (or Tell-) el-Kebir (tel-el-ke-bër'). A village in Lower Egypt, situated on the Freshwater Canal about 50 miles northeast of Cairo. Here, Sept. 13, 1882, the British under Wolsey defeated the Egyptian insurgents under Arabi Pasha; loss of the latter, about 3,000. The surrender of Arabi Pasha followed.

Telemachus (te-lem'ä-kus). [Gr. Τηλέμαχος.] In Greek legend, the son of Odysseus and Penelope. He visited Pylos (attended by Athene in the guise of Mentor) and Sparta, in search of his father, and joined the latter, on his return to Ithaca, in slaying the suitors of Penelope.

Telemachus. An Asiatic monk, famous for his attempt in 404 to stop the gladiatorial shows. He sprang into the arena and endeavored to separate the gladiators, but was stoned to death by the spectators. He was proclaimed a martyr by the emperor Honorius; and his act and death led to the abolition of the exhibitions.

Télémaque (tä-lä-mäk'), Avantures de. [F., 'Adventures of Telemachus.'] A romance by Fénelon, published in 1699. It is founded on the legendary history of Telemachus, and is one of the classics of French literature.

Though the beautiful fiction of Telemachus, which has much in common with, and was doubtless suggested to Fénelon by the Argens, be rather an epic poem in prose than a romance, it seems to have led the way to several political romances, or, at least, to have nourished a taste for this species of composition.

Dumlop, Hist. of Prose Fict., II. 348.

Telemarken (tä-lä-mär'ken). A mountainous and picturesque region in the amt of Bratsberg, southern Norway.

Telepheus (tel'e-fus). [Gr. Τηλεφεός.] In Greek legend, the son of Hercules and Ange; king of Mysia at the time of the Greek expedition against Troy.

Telescope, The. See Telescopium.

Telescope (tel'e-sköp) Mountains. A mountain group in eastern California, east of Owen's Lake and west of Death Valley.

Telescopium (tel-e-skō'pi-um). A southern constellation, introduced by Lacaille in 1752. It contains one star of the fourth magnitude. Telescopium Herscheli is a constellation inserted by the Abbé Hell in 1789 between Lynx, Auriga, and Gemini. It is obsolete.

Telford (tel'förd). Thomas. Born at Eskdale, Dumfriesshire, Aug. 9, 1757; died at Westminster, Sept. 2, 1834. A Scottish civil engineer. He built the bridge across the Severn at Montford in 1792; was engineer of the Ellesmere Canal (1793), the Caledonian Canal (1802), the Gloucester and Berkeley Canal (1818), and the Grand Trunk Canal (1822); and in 1810 superintended the construction of the Gotha Canal, Sweden. From 1803 he superintended the construction of nearly 1,000 miles of road in the Highlands of Scotland, and afterward constructed lines of road through North Wales, surmounting great natural difficulties. The most notable parts of this undertaking were the erection of the Menai suspension-bridge and the Conway bridge. He built the road from Warsaw to Brest-Sitovski in Poland. He improved the harbors of Aberdeen and Dundee, and built St. Catherine's docks in London. In 1828-30 he drained nearly 50,000 acres of the Fen country. The Telford pavement was his invention.

Tell (tel). The. That part of Algeria which lies along the coast of the Mediterranean, and comprises the cultivated land. The name is extended to include the similarly placed regions of Morocco and Tunis.

Tell (tel), William. One of the legendary heroes of Switzerland in the struggle for independence of the cantons Schwyz, Uri, and Unterwalden with Albrecht of Austria (the German emperor Albrecht I.). The story, in its familiar form, is that Tell, who was the head of the independent confederates, having refused to salute the cap which Gessler, the Austrian governor, had placed for that purpose in the market-place of Altorf, was ordered to place an apple on the head of his little son and shoot it off. He did so, and revealed another arrow with which he had intended to shoot Gessler if he had killed his son. He was taken across the lake by Gessler to Küssnacht Castle to be eaten alive by reptiles; but, a storm coming up, he shot the governor, escaped, and afterward liberated his country. The Tell legend in its Swiss form appears for the first time in a chronicle, written between 1467 and 1476, contained in a manuscript known as the "White Book of Sarnen," which places the events after the accession of Rudolf to the empire in 1273. It is also found in the "Chronicle" of Melchior Russ of Lucerne, who began to write in 1482. The principal source, however, of the life and deeds of Tell is the "Chronicon Helveticum" ("Swiss Chronicle") of Egidius Tschudi (1505-72), where the year 1307 is given as the date of the Tell incident. Based principally upon Tschudi is Schiller's drama "Wilhelm Tell" (1804), which closely follows the episode as related by the Swiss chronicler, and even incorporates some of the speeches word for word. The legend of William Tell is in its ultimate origin a Germanic myth. The earliest extant version of this story of the apple is contained in the Old Norse Vilkinna Saga, from the 13th century, whose material, however, according to its own account, was derived from German sources. The story of the famous shot of the archer Eigil is here related with circumstantiality of detail. At the command of King Nidung an apple is placed upon the head of the three-year-old son of Eigil, who is then made to shoot, and strikes it, directly in the middle, with his first arrow. When asked why he had taken two other arrows when only one shot was allowed, he replied boldly, "In order to shoot the king if I had injured the child." Another version of the legend is found in Saxo Grammaticus, who wrote his "Historia Danica" early in the 13th century. The apple-shot is also told in English territory of William of Cloudeley. The Swiss story of William Tell is simply a localization of the legend, which was, apparently, once common Germanic property.

Tell-el-Amarna. See Tel-el-Amarna.

Tell-el-Kebir. See Tel-el-Kebir.

Teller (tel'ër), Henry Moore. Born at Granger, Alleghany County, N. Y., May 23, 1830. An American lawyer and Republican politician. He was United States senator from Colorado 1876-82; secretary of the Interior 1882-85; and United States senator from Colorado 1885-.

Tellez (tel'yeth), Gabriel; pseudonym, Tirso de Molina. Born at Madrid about 1570; died in the convent of Soria, 1648. A noted Spanish dramatist. He entered the church before 1613, and became the head of the convent of Soria. Five volumes of his plays were published under his pseudonym between 1616 and 1636; among these the best-known out of Spain is "El Burlador de Sevilla" ("The Seville Deceiver"), "the earliest distinct exhibition of that Don Juan who is now seen on every stage in Europe." In Spain "Don Gil de las Calzas Verdes" ("Don Gil in the Green Pantaloon") is the favorite. Among his other plays may be mentioned "Vergonzoso en Palacio" ("A Bashful Man at Court"), "La Lealtad contra la Envidia," "Por el Sotano y el Torno," and "Escarmientos para Cuernos." He published in 1624 "Cigarrales de Toledo," an account of entertainments given by a wedding party at a cigarral or small country house resorted to for recreation in summer. These were stories told, plays acted, poetry recited, etc., a theatrical framework being used to connect the separate parts instead of the narrative adopted by Boccaccio in the "Decamerone," from which the idea was taken. This style was soon imitated by other authors. Tirso published another of a graver tone, "Pleasure and Profit," in 1635.

Tellez y Giron (tel-yeth' ē hē-rōn'), Pedro, Duke of Osuna (or Ossuna). Born at Valladolid, Spain, 1579; died 1624. A Spanish statesman, viceroy of Sicily 1611-15, and of Naples 1616-20.

Tellicherry, or Tellicherry (tel-i-cher'i). A seaport in the Malabar district, Madras, British India, situated on the Arabian Sea in lat. 11° 45' N., long. 75° 29' E. It has considerable trade. Population (1891), 27,196.

Tello, or Tel-loh (tel-lō'). A site in Chaldea excavated by De Sarzec between 1877 and 1881. These explorations have shed a new light upon the development of Mesopotamian art by supplying a series of very ancient monuments of architecture and sculpture which can be dated. The site is believed to be the ancient Sirpulla. Its remains form a number of the low mounds produced by the degradation of Mesopotamian platforms and buildings in unbaked brick, spread over a space nearly 5 miles long. The sculpture which is more direct in spirit and more lifelike than that of the later Babylonian age, Assyrian art, reached its best period about 2500 B. C., but much that is older and more primitive has been found. The architecture already exhibits the later types, though in simpler form. The chief portable remains are in the Louvre.

Tellsplatte (telz-plät'te). [G., 'Tell's slab.'] A stone on the Axenberg, north of Flüelen, on the eastern bank of the Lake of Lucerne, where William Tell, according to the legend, sprang out of Gessler's boat.

Tellus (tel'us). [L., 'earth.'] In Roman mythology, a goddess, the personification of the earth.

Telmessus (tel-mes'us). In ancient geography, a town on the coast of Lycia, Asia Minor, in lat. 36° 36' N., long. 29° 10' E., on the site of the modern village of Makri. Among the important antiquities on its site is an ancient theater, well preserved and of good style. The cavea is semicircular, with one precinct; its diameter is 254 feet, that of the orchestra 92. The stage structure measures 141 by 40 feet.

Teman (të'man). ['South,' properly 'the country to the right.'] The southern district and people of Edom (Idumea): from Teman, the grandson of Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 11-15).

Teme (tëm). A river on the boundary between Wales and England, and in western England, which joins the Severn 3 miles south of Worcester. Length, about 70 miles.

Téméraire (tä-mä-rär'). 1. A line-of-battle ship of 98 guns, called "the Fighting Téméraire," captured from the French at the battle of the Nile, Aug. 1, 1798. She fought next to the Victory in the line at the battle of Trafalgar, Oct. 21, 1805, under Captain Harvey. She was broken up in 1838. Turner's picture of "the Fighting Téméraire" was exhibited at the Royal Academy in 1839.

2. A British armored war-ship, launched in 1876. Her dimensions are: length, 285 feet; breadth, 62 feet; draught, 27 feet; displacement, 8,540 tons. She has an armored water-line belt 11 inches thick, and a central single-decked citadel with armor 10.8 inches thick. She has 4 25-ton guns mounted en barbette fore and aft upon the upper deck.

Temes (tem'esh). A river in southern Hungary which joins the Danube 8 miles east of Belgrad. Length, about 250 miles.

Temeser Banat (tem'esh-er bänät'). A former administrative division, comprising the present counties of Temes, Krassó, and Torontál, in Hungary.

Temesvár (tem'esh-vär). A free city, capital of the county of Temes, Hungary, situated on the Bega Canal in lat. 45° 47' N., long. 21° 13' E. It consists of the city proper, or fortress, and several suburbs. It is an administrative and military center. Among its buildings are a Roman Catholic cathedral, and a castle built in the middle of the 15th century. Temesvár was besieged and taken by the Turks in 1552; and was several times fruitlessly besieged, but finally taken, by Prince Eugene in 1716 and assigned to Hungary. It was made a royal free city in 1781. It was defended by the Austrians against the Hungarian insurgents in 1849, who were defeated by Haynau Aug. 9, 1849. Population (1890), 39,850.

Temiscaming (te-mis'ka-ming), Lake. A lake on the border line between the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, Canada, intersected by lat. 47° 30' N. Its outlet is the Ottawa River. Length, about 26 miles.

Temiscouata (tem-is-kō-ä'tä), Lake. A lake in Temiscouata County, Quebec, Canada, east of Quebec. Its outlet is the Madawaska River. Length, about 22 miles.

Temme (tem'me), Jodocus Donatus Hubertus. Born at Lette, Westphalia, Oct. 22, 1798; died at Zurich, Nov. 14, 1881. A German jurist, liberal politician, and novelist; in the judicial service of Prussia. He was tried for high treason in 1849, and was acquitted but was dismissed from the service. He wrote "criminal novels."

Temminck (tem'mink), Coenraad Jacob. Born about 1778; died in 1858. A Dutch naturalist, noted as an ornithologist.

Temora (te-mō'rä). One of the poems of Ossian, published in 1763. See Ossian.

Tempe (tem'pē), Vale of. [Gr. Τέμπε, contracted from Τέμπεα.] A valley in eastern Thessaly, Greece, deeply cleft between Olympus on the north and Óssa on the south, and traversed by the Peneius. It has been celebrated from ancient times for its beauty; but "the scenery is distinguished rather by savage grandeur than by the sylvan beauty which Ælian and others attribute to it." Length, about 6 miles.

Tempel (tem'pel), Ernst Wilhelm Lebercht. Born at Nieder-Kunersdorf, Lusatia, Dec. 4, 1821; died at Areetri, Italy, March 16, 1889. A German astronomer, director of the observatory at Areetri, near Florence. He discovered several asteroids, comets, etc.

Tempest (tem'pest), The. A play by Shakspeare, first performed at court in 1611, first printed in the folio of 1623. The subject was taken from a pamphlet "A Discovery of the Bermudas, otherwise called the Isle of Devils," by "one Jourdan, who probably returned from Virginia" (1610). Fleay thinks it was probably abridged by Beaumont about 1613, and the mask inserted. In 1667 Dryden and Davenant produced "The Tempest, or the Enchanted Island" (printed in 1670), a version intended to improve Shakspeare's play; the mutilations, or rather additions, are now said by a German scholar to be wholesale conveyances from a play of Calderon. (Furness.)

In 1673 Shadwell turned "The Tempest" into an opera, and in 1756 Garrick produced an opera with the same name, based on Shakspeare and Dryden; he repudiated the authorship. Sir Arthur Sullivan has written "The Music to Shakspeare's Tempest," in twelve numbers: this was first performed in 1862.

Templars (tem'plārz). A military order, also called Knights Templars or Knights of the Temple, from the early headquarters of the order in the Crusaders' palace at Jerusalem (the so-called temple of Solomon). The order was founded at Jerusalem about 1118, and was confirmed by the Pope in 1128. Its special aim was protection to pilgrims on the way to the holy shrines, and the distinguishing garb of the knights was a white mantle with a red cross. The order took a leading part in the conduct of the Crusades, and spread rapidly, acquiring great wealth and influence in Spain, France, England, and other countries in Europe. Its chief seats in the East were Jerusalem, Acre, and Cyprus, and in Europe a foundation called the Temple, then just outside Paris. The members comprised knights, men-at-arms, and chaplains; they were grouped in commanderies, with a preceptor at the head of each province, and a grand master at the head of the order. The Templars were accused of heresy, immorality, and other offenses by Philip IV. of France in 1307, and the order was suppressed by the Council of Vienne in 1312.

Temple (tem'pl). The. The religious edifice of the Jews in Jerusalem. There were three buildings successively erected in the same spot, and entitled, from the names of their builders, the temple of Solomon, the temple of Zerubbabel, and the temple of Herod. The first was built by Solomon, and was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar about 586 B. C. The second was built by the Jews on their return from the captivity (about 537 B. C.), and was pillaged or partly destroyed several times, especially by Antiochus Epiphanes, Pompey, and Herod. The third, the largest and most magnificent of the three, was begun by Herod the Great, and was completely destroyed at the capture of Jerusalem by the Romans (A. D. 70). Various attempts have been made toward the restoration of the first and the third of these temples, but scholars are not agreed in respect to architectural details. The ornament and design were in any case of severe and simple character, though rich materials were used. The successive temples all consisted of a combination of buildings, comprising courts separated from and rising one above another, and provided also with chambers for the use of the priests and for educational purposes. The inclosure of Herod's temple covered 19 acres. It comprised an outer court of the Gentiles, a court of the women, a court of Israel, a court of the priests, and the temple building with the holy place, and, within all (entered only once a year, and only by the high priest), the holy of holies. Within the court of the priests were the great altar and the laver; within the holy place, the golden candlestick, the altar of incense, and the table for the showbread; and within the holy of holies, the ark of the covenant and the mercy-seat.

Temple, The. A lodge in London of the religious and military establishment of the middle ages known as the Knights Templars. The Temple Church, London, is the only part of it now existing. The first settlement of the Knights Templars of the Holy Sepulchre in London was in Holborn, where in 1118 they built a house which must have stood near the northeast corner of Chancery Lane. They removed to the New Temple in the Strand in 1154. When the order was suppressed in the reign of Edward II., their house was given by the king to the Earl of Pembroke; it went next to the Earl of Lancaster, and at his death reverted to the crown. In 1338 it went to the Knights Hospitalers of St. John of Jerusalem, at Clerkenwell, who leased part of it in 1346 to students of the common law, and on the site of the London Temple the two Inns of Court called the Middle Temple and Inner Temple now stand; they have ever since been occupied by barristers, and are the joint property of the Societies of the Inner and of the Middle Temple, which have the right of calling candidates to the degree of barrister. The Inner Temple is so called because it is within the precincts of the City, the Middle Temple because it was between the Inner and Outer Temple. The Outer Temple remained in the possession of the Bishop of Exeter when the remainder was leased, and was afterward converted into the Exeter Buildings.

Temple, The Mormon. The chief religious building of the Mormons. See Salt Lake City.

Temple (tonpl), Le. A fortified lodge of the Knights Templars established in Paris by the Council of Troyes in 1128, standing where the Marché du Temple now stands. After the abolition of the order in 1322, the old building was used for various purposes. The chapel (similar in general plan to that in London) stood until 1650, and the great square tower, made memorable by the imprisonment of Louis XVI. in 1792-93, was destroyed in 1810.

Temple (tem'pl), Frederick. Born Nov. 30, 1821; died Dec. 23, 1902. Archbishop of Canterbury (1896). He graduated at Balliol College, 1842; was head-master of Rugby 1858-69; in 1860 became prominent as the author of the first of the "Essays and Reviews"; and in 1868-70 advocated the disestablishment of the Irish Church. He was appointed bishop of Exeter 1869, and bishop of London 1885. He published "Sermons Preached in Rugby Chapel" (1861).

Temple, Henry John, Viscount Palmerston. Born at Broadlands, near Romsey, Hampshire, Oct. 20, 1781; died at Brocket Hall, near Hatfield, Hertfordshire, Oct. 18, 1865. A British statesman. He belonged to the Irish branch of the Temple family. On April 17, 1802, he succeeded to his father's title. He was educated at Harrow. He became member of Parliament for Newtown, Isle of Wight, in 1807, and junior lord of the admiralty in the Duke of Portland's administration in the same year. From 1809 to 1828 he was secretary of war. At this time he was a Tory, a disciple of Pitt, and an advocate of Catholic emancipation. In 1830 he entered the Whig ministry of Lord Grey as minister of foreign affairs. His activity in this position was very great. He was interested in the policy which established Prince Leopold of Saxe-Coburg on the throne of Belgium, and in the maintenance of the Ottoman empire as a defense against Russia on the Bosphorus and France on the Nile. At the close of the Melbourne administration in 1841, Palmerston went out of office for 5 years. In 1848, in the ministry of Lord John Russell, he sympathized with the revolutionary party in Europe, and ardently supported the Italian revolution. In 1851 he openly approved the coup d'état of Louis Napoleon, and was dismissed from the foreign office. He became secretary of state for the home office under the Earl of Aberdeen in 1852. On Feb. 5, 1855, he became prime minister, and retained the office, with the interval of Lord Derby's administration in 1858-1859, until his death.

Temple, Knights of the. See Templars.

Temple, Sir William. Born at London, 1628; died at Moor Park, Surrey, Jan. 27, 1699. An English diplomatist, statesman, and author. He was educated at Cambridge; entered Parliament in 1660; concluded a treaty with the Bishop of Munster in 1665; became minister at Brussels in 1665; negotiated the treaty of the Triple Alliance in 1668; was ambassador at The Hague 1668-71; negotiated a peace with the Netherlands in 1674; was ambassador to the Congress of Nimwegen; formed a plan for a privy council in 1679, and became one of its chief members; and withdrew from public life in 1681. He wrote "An Essay on the Present State and Settlement of Ireland" (1668), "The Empire, etc." (1671), "Observations upon the United Provinces" (1672), "Essay upon Government" (1672), "Trade in Ireland" (1673), "Miscellanies," including poems (1679 and 1692), "Memoirs" (1691 and 1700), and "Introduction to the History of England" (1695).

Temple Bar. A famous gateway before the Temple in London, which formerly divided Fleet street from the Strand. According to ancient custom, when the sovereign visited the City, he asked permission of the lord mayor to pass it. In its last form it was a rather ugly archway built by Wren in 1670. It spanned the street with an elliptical arch flanked by two small arches over the footways, and had a second story in which were four niches with statues of sovereigns, and a curved pediment above. It was removed in 1878, and re-erected at Waltham Cross, Herts. It is now represented by a monument called the Temple Bar Memorial, a tall pedestal with statues of Queen Victoria and the Prince of Wales in niches at the sides, surmounted by the griffin and arms of the city of London.

Temple Beau, The. A comedy by Henry Fielding, produced in 1730.

Temple Church. A church within the bounds of the Inner Temple in London. It consists of the Round Church and the Choir. The former is in rich Norman style; it is 58 feet in diameter, and was finished in 1185. The Choir is Early English. The Round Church contains several beautiful altar-tombs of Templars.

Temple Gardens. Gardens belonging to the Temple, London, separated from the Thames by the Victoria Embankment. According to Shakspeare, the red and white roses which were assumed as badges of the houses of Lancaster and York were plucked in this garden by Plantagenet and Somerset at the end of the brawl which began the civil war.

Temple of Concord. See Girgenti.

Temple of Fame, The. A poem by Alexander Pope, published in 1715. It differs from Chaucer's "House of Fame," though imitating it.

Temple of Glass, The. A poem by Lydgate, partly imitated from Chaucer's "House of Fame."

Temple of Heaven or of the Great Dragon. A temple at Peking, perhaps the most notable of Chinese temples. It stands in an inclosure of about a square mile. From the gate a causeway leads to the temple, which is surrounded by subordinate buildings. The temple proper stands on a 3-staged terrace ascended by flights of steps; it is circular, rising in 3 recessed stages each with a widely projecting roof, that of the highest stage forming a concave cone of blue tiles terminating in a gilded oval finial. The date assigned is 1420.

Temple of Mexico. See Tzucalli.

Temple of the Cross. A name commonly given to one of the ruined edifices at Palenque, Mexico. In a small inner room of this building there is a structure resembling an altar; and above this altar formerly stood the remarkable symbolic group from which the temple derives its name. This consisted of 3 sculptured slabs joined together, showing a central cross-like symbol, with a human figure on each side, and numerous hieroglyphics. The middle slab, containing the cross, is now in the museum at Mexico; one of the others is at Washington, where it is known as the Palenque tablet; the third is still at Palenque. The meaning of the cross has been a subject for much conjecture and dispute; it was probably a symbol of the fertilizing powers of nature. Another sculpture from the same building is supposed to represent the Maya rain-god. The temple itself is a quadrilateral, and rests on a truncated pyramid. See Palenque Tablet.

Temple of the Sun (at Cuzeo). See Curicancha.

Temptation of St. Anthony. 1. A painting by Pieter Brueghel the younger (1604), in the museum at Dresden. The saint is praying in a cave partly roofed with old planks, and undergoes temptation from a young woman richly dressed and attended by fantastic demons. The architecture and scenery of the background present a free rendering of Tivoli.

2. A painting by Tintoretto, in San Trovaso at Venice. The saint sits calmly, with four temptors about him, one a demon, and two women, young and beautiful.

Ten, Council of. In the ancient republic of Venice, a secret tribunal instituted in 1310 and continued down to the overthrow of the republic in 1797. It was composed at first of 10 and later of 17 members, and exercised unlimited power in the supervision of internal and external affairs, often with great rigor and oppressiveness.

Tenaino (tē-ni'no). A tribe of North American Indians, nearly related to the Warm Springs Indians. They formerly lived at Celilo, Oregon, on the Columbia River. Their remnants are on the Warm Springs reservation, Oregon, and number 69. See Shahaptian.

Tennessee (ten-e-sé'). The principal tributary of the Ohio River. It is formed by the union at Kingston, East Tennessee, of the Clinch and Holston (which rise in Virginia), and flows southwest in Tennessee past Chattanooga, then west through Alabama, touching the northeast corner of Mississippi, and then north through Tennessee and Kentucky, to join the Ohio at Paducah, Kentucky. Total length, including the Holston, 1,100 to 1,200 miles; navigable the greater part of its course. The chief obstruction is at the Muscle Shoals in Alabama.

Tennessee. One of the South Central States of the United States of America. Capital, Nashville; chief cities, Memphis and Chattanooga. It is bounded by Kentucky and Virginia on the north; North Carolina on the southeast; Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi on the south; and Arkansas and Missouri (separated by the Mississippi River) on the west. It is mountainous in the east, containing the Alleghanies and the Cumberland plateau, and is lower in the center and west. The leading agricultural productions are Indian corn, cotton, and tobacco. The manufactures (iron, cotton, etc.) are increasing. The State has 96 counties, sends 2 senators and 10 representatives to Congress, and has 12 electoral votes. This region was claimed in early times by North Carolina, and by the French and Spaniards. The leading settlement was made from Virginia and North Carolina in 1769. The temporary State of Franklin was formed in 1784. North Carolina ceded its claims to the United States, and the Territory of Tennessee was formed in 1790. It was admitted to the Union in 1796. It seceded June 8, 1861, and was the scene of many important events in the Civil War, including the battles of Fort Donelson, Shiloh, Island No. 10, Memphis, Murfreesboro, Chickamauga, the relief of Chattanooga and Knoxville, and the battles of Franklin and Nashville. It was readmitted in 1866. Area, 42,050 square miles. Population (1900), 2,020,616.

Tennyson (ten'i-son), Alfred, first Lord Tennyson. Born at Somersby, Lincolnshire, Aug. 6, 1809; died at Aldworth House, near Haslemere, Surrey, Oct. 6, 1892. A celebrated English poet. He was the son of George Clayton Tennyson, vicar of Great Grimsby and rector of Somersby and Enderby. He published with his brother Charles a collection of juvenile poems ("Poems by Two Brothers") in 1827; was a student at Trinity College, Cambridge, 1828-31 (with Arthur H. Hallam, Loughton, Trench, and others), where he wrote the prize poem "Timbuctoo" (1829); lived at various places till 1850, when he married and settled at Twickenham; and afterward lived at Aldworth (Sussex), and from 1853 at Farringford (Isle of Wight). He received a state pension in 1845, succeeded Wordsworth as poet laureate in 1850, and was raised to the peerage as Baron Tennyson of Aldworth in 1884. He lived a secluded life, and died of old age after a short and painless illness. He was buried in the Poets' Corner, near Chaucer, in Westminster Abbey. He wrote "Poems, Chiefly Lyrical" (1830; including "Mariana," "Recollections of the Arabian Nights," "The Ballad of Oriana," etc.), "Poems" (1832; including "The Lady of Shalott," "The Miller's Daughter," "Ehonor," "The Palace of Art," "The May Queen," "The Lotus Eaters," and "A Dream of Fair Women"), "Poems" (1842; including "Ulysses," "Two Voices," "The Talking Oak," "Morte d'Arthur," "The Gardener's Daughter," and "Locksley Hall"), "The Princess," a medley (1847), "In Memoriam" (1850), "Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington" (1852), "Charge of the Light Brigade," "Maud" and other poems (1855), "Idylls of the King" (1859-85), "A Welcome to the Princess Alexandra" (1863), "Enoch Arden and Other Poems" (1864), "The Golden Supper" (1869), "The Window, or the Songs of the Wrens," with music by Sir Arthur Sullivan (1870), "Queen Mary" (a drama, 1875), "Harold" (a drama, 1876), "The Falcon" (a short play, acted 1879, published 1884), "The Cup" (a short play, acted 1881, published 1881), "The Promise of May" (acted 1882, published 1886), "Becket" (a drama, 1884), "The Lover's Tale" (1879; including as its fourth part "The Golden Supper"), "Ballads and Other Poems" (1880), "Tiresias and Other Poems" (partly new, 1885), "Locksley Hall Sixty Years After" (1886), "Demeter and Other Poems" (1889), "The Death of Ehonor, Akbar's Dream, and Other Poems" (1892), "The Foresters, Robin Hood, and Maid Marian" (a drama, 1892).

Tennyson, Charles. See Turner.

Tennyson, Frederick. Born in 1807; died at Kensington, London, Feb. 26, 1898. An English poet, brother of Alfred Tennyson. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and in 1828 took the medal for a Greek poem. He published a volume of poems entitled "Days and Hours" (1854), "Isles of Greece" (1890), "Daphne and Other Poems" (1891).

Tenoctitlan (ten-öch-tët-län'). [Derivation doubtful.] The chief city of the Aztecs, occupying the site of the modern city of Mexico. It was founded about 1325 on what was then an island in Tezuczo Lake. Causeways were built to the adjacent mainland, and these appear to have been the only approaches. Many of the streets were occupied by canals, and the houses were subject to frequent inundations. Water was supplied from Chapultepec by an aqueduct. The most remarkable building was the teocalli, or great temple; most of the other edifices were low, and probably were built of adobe. The Spaniards under Cortés entered peaceably, but were subsequently driven out, and only took the place in 1521, after a terrible siege, in which a great part of the city was destroyed. (See Cortés.) The new capital, which was built on its site, was commonly and officially called Tenoctitlan (corrupted to Tezcutitlan, Tenustitan, etc.) for many years after the conquest. Mexico (Aztec Mexitlan) was also a name of the ancient city, or perhaps of a portion of it; probably from one of the appellations of the war-god Huitzilopochtli.

Tenos (të'nös), or Tinos (të'nös), or Tino (të'nö). [Gr. Τῖνος.] An island of the Cyclades, belonging to Greece, southeast of Andros and northeast of Syra; one of the most prosperous of the Greek islands. It exports wine and marble. The chief place is Tino (St. Nicolo). Length, 17 miles. Population, about 12,000.

Tensas (ten'sas), or Tensaw (ten'sä), River. An offtake or bayou of the Alabama River, in Alabama, which flows parallel with Mobile River and empties into Mobile Bay.

Tensas, or Tensaw River. A river in southeastern Arkansas and northeastern Louisiana, which joins the Washita about 26 miles west by north of Natchez. Length, over 200 miles; navigable about two thirds of its course.

Tensan. See Taensa.

Tenterden (ten'tër-den). A small town in Kent, England.

Tenterden, Baron. See Abbott.

Tenth Legion. A legion of the Roman army, celebrated for its valor, in the time of Julius Cæsar.

Ten Thousand, Retreat of the. See Anabasis.

Ten Thousand a Year. A novel by Samuel Warren, published in 1841.

Tentyra, or Tentyris. See Denderah.

Teocalli (tä-ö-käl'yë). [Nahuatl, 'house of the god.'] A general name applied to any pyramidal temple in ancient Mexico; in particular, the great temple in Tenoctitlan or Mexico City. It was completed about 1486 by Ahuitzotl. According to the accounts which have come down to us, it was an artificial truncated pyramid, faced with stone, about 375 feet long by 300 feet broad at the base, and 325 by 250 feet at the top, which was 86 feet above the ground. In ascending to the summit it was necessary to pass five times around it, on a series of terraces; this arrangement was well adapted to exhibit processions as well as for defense. On the flat surface were several small buildings, with the images of Huitzilopochtli and other gods and the sacrificial stone. The pyramid was surrounded by a stone wall nearly 5,000 feet in circumference, and probably inclosing other but smaller temples. The great teocalli was the scene of several fierce battles between the Spaniards and Indians in 1520-21. After the city was taken, the pyramid was torn down, and a part of its site is now occupied by the cathedral. Some of the sculptured stones and idols which were on or near it are now in the Mexican national museum. See Huitzilopochtli, Teoyomiqú, and Sacrificial Stone.

Teos (të'os). [Gr. Τεός.] In ancient geography, an Ionian city of Asia Minor, situated on the western coast 25 miles southwest of Smyrna. Its ruins contain a noted temple of Bacchus, a beautiful Ionic hexastyle peripteros on a stylobate of 3 steps. It stood in a court surrounded by stoas. The fine sculptured frieze is in the museum at Constantinople.

Teotihuacan, or San Juan Teotihuacan (sän hwan tä-ö-të-wä-kän'). A town of the republic and state of Mexico, 27 miles northeast of Mexico City. In the vicinity are many remarkable ruins, including two very large and many small pyramids, a walled inclosure called the "citadel," etc. Tradition assigns these remains to the Toltecs (which see), and they are certainly older than the Aztec period. Population of the modern town, about 5,000.

Teoyomiqú (tä-ö-you-më'kë). The name given to a stone idol which was dug up near the ancient teocalli at Mexico, and is now in the Mexican national museum. Leon y Gama, who first described it under this name, states that Teoyomiqú was the wife or female companion of the war-god Huitzilopochtli; others suppose that the statue is compound, representing several gods. It is doubtful if Teoyomiqú was really a personage in the Nahuatl mythology; and the best modern investigators are inclined to believe that this hideous stone was the war-god himself. It is about 8½ feet high and 5½ feet wide. See Huitzilopochtli.

It is covered with carvings almost to overloading. . . . The general effect, however, is appalling, and the stone presents a most hideous agglomeration of repulsive forms. . . . In place of christening the monolith after an imaginary composite deity of whose existence the oldest authorities make no mention, it strikes me as much more natural to believe that it represents the well-known war-god of the Mexican tribe, Huitzilopochtli; and that consequently it was indeed the famous principal idol of aboriginal Mexico, or Tenoctitlan.

Bandelier, Report of an Archeological Tour in Mexico, pp. 59, 67.

Teapanecs (tä-pä-näks'), or Teapanecs (täk-pä-näks'). A Nahuatl tribe of the Mexican valley. They were originally a branch of the Tezucucans who settled at Azcapotzalco, on the western shore of Lake Tezuczo, about 1168. In the 14th century the Aztecs of Tenoctitlan paid tribute to them. About 1430 the Aztecs conquered them, destroyed their capital at Azcapotzalco, and established a slave-market on its site. The Teapanecs were allowed to form a new capital a little to the south of the old one, at Tlacopan (now Tacuba). They joined with Tenoctitlan and Tezuczo in the confederacy formed soon after, but never rose to prominence. Tlacopan was joined to Tenoctitlan by a causeway over which Cortés retreated on the Noche Triste.

Tepeguana. See Tepehuan.

Tepehuan (tä-pä-hwän'). A tribe of North American Indians which inhabit mainly the eastern slope of the Sierra Madre, from lat. 25° to 26° N., in the state of Durango, Mexico. Their domain formerly extended across the borders into Chihuahua, Sinaloa, Jalisco, Zacatecas, and Coahuila. Their tribal name is adapted from a term signifying 'conqueror.' Number, less than 1,000. See Piman.

Tepec (tä-pëk'). 1. A territory of Mexico, on the Pacific coast north of the state of Jalisco, to which it was formerly attached. Area, 11,551 square miles. Population (1895), 144,308 (mostly semi-civilized Indians).—2. The capital of the territory, 18 miles from the Bay of San Blas. Population (1895), 16,226.

Teplitz (tëp'lits), or Töplitz (tëp'lits). A town and watering-place in northern Bohemia, situated in the valley of the Biela, near the mountains, 46 miles northwest of Prague. It is one of the most frequented watering-places in Europe (saline-alkaline springs), and has been the scene of several conferences of princes. Population (1891), commune, 17,526.

Teplitz, Alliance of. A treaty of alliance between the monarchs of Russia, Austria, and Prussia against Napoleon, signed at Teplitz Sept. 9, 1813.

Tequendama (tä-kän-dä'mä). A celebrated waterfall of the republic of Colombia, on the Funza or Bogotá River, 12 miles southwest of Bogotá. It is 475 feet high, and perpendicular.

Ter (tër). A river in northeastern Spain, flowing into the Mediterranean east of Gerona. Length, about 85 miles.

Terah (të'räh). The father of Abraham (Gen. xi.). The name is etymologically connected by some with the Assyrian terah, antelope.

Teramo (tä'rä-më), formerly Abruzzo Ulteriore I. A province in central Italy, in the compartmento of the Abruzzi and Molise. Area, 1,067 square miles. Population (1891), 264,088.

Teramo. The capital of the province of Teramo, Italy, situated at the junction of the Vezzola with the Tordino, in lat. 42° 40' N., long. 13° 45' E.; the ancient Interamnium, and the medieval Aprutium (also Interampne, Teramne, Terame)

It has a cathedral and Roman antiquities. Population (1892), 21,000.

Terburg (ter' bōrēh) (originally Ter Borch), Gerard. Born at Zwolle, Netherlands, about 1608; died at Deventer, Netherlands, 1681. A Dutch genre- and portrait-painter, noted particularly for his draperies.

Terceira (ter-sā' rā). One of the principal islands of the Azores, situated northwest of St. Michael. It contains Angra, the capital of the group. A regency in behalf of Queen Maria was established here in 1829 by Villalor with Palmella and Guereira. Length, about 28 miles. Population, about 45,000-50,000.

In Dec., 1828, an expedition, consisting of 652 Portuguese refugees of the party of the queen, sailed from England for Terceira in four vessels, under the command of Count Saldanha. Terceira held for the queen, and arms and ammunition had previously been sent them from England. The British government ordered Captain Walpole, of the "Ranger," to stop this expedition off Terceira, which he did by firing a gun into Saldanha's ship. The ground taken by the Duke of Wellington in defence of this measure was his resolution to maintain the neutrality of England between the two parties then contending for the crown of Portugal; but the proceeding was vehemently attacked in Parliament and elsewhere.

Greville, Memoirs (editor's note), I, 169.

Terceira, Duke of (Antonio José de Souza, Count of Villalor). Born at Lisbon, March 10, 1792; died there, April 27, 1860. A Portuguese general and politician. He went to Terceira in 1828, and took part in the political events there; conquered the Azores in 1831 in behalf of Maria da Gloria; landed at Oporto May 26, 1832; and defeated the Miguelists several times in 1833 and 1834. He was minister of war and premier.

Terek (te-rek'). A river in Caucasia, Russia, which flows by a broad delta into the Caspian Sea about lat. 44° N. Length, about 350 miles.

Terek. A province of Caucasia, Russia, situated on the northern slope of the Caucasus, south of Stavropol. Capital, Vladikavkas. Area, 26,822 square miles. Population (1891), 798,145.

Terhune (tēr-hūn'), Mrs. (Mary Virginia Hawes); pseudonym Marion Harland. Born in Amelia County, Va., 1830. An American novelist and miscellaneous writer. Among her novels are "Alone" (1854), "The Hidden Path" (1855), "Sunnybank," etc. Her works on housekeeping include "Common Sense in the Household" (1871), "Breakfast, Luncheon, and Tea" (1875), etc.

Terlizzi (tēr-lēt'sē). A town in the province of Bari, Italy, 20 miles west of Bari. Population (1881), 20,442; commune, 20,592.

Termagant (tēr-mā-gant). A name given to the god of the Saracens in the medieval romances, in which he is constantly linked with Mahound. In "Orlando Furioso" he is called Trevigant. The French romances called it Termagante. The origin of the term is unknown. It is possible that the latter part of the word, magant, may conceal the name Mahound, or Mahomet; if so, it is simply an invocation of the prophet. The word in recent times means only a scolding woman.

Terminalia (tēr-mi-nā' li-ā). In Roman antiquity, a festival celebrated annually in honor of Terminus, the god of boundaries. It was held on the 23d of February, its essential feature being a survey or perambulation of boundaries.

Termini (tār-mō-nē), or Termini Imerese. A seaport in the province of Palermo, Sicily, 21 miles east-southeast of Palermo; the ancient Therme Imerenses. It has warm springs, and contains many antiquities. It is noted for its macaroni, and for its sardines and tunny-fisheries. Near it is the site of the ancient Himera (which see). Population (1881), 22,733; commune, 23,148.

Terminos (tār-mō-nōs), Laguna de. A large lagoon on the coast of the state of Campeche, Mexico, communicating with the Bay of Campeche. It was so called by the pilot Alaminos, in 1518, because he supposed it to mark the western limit of Yucatan.

Terminus (tēr-mi-nus). In Roman mythology, the god of boundaries; the deity who presided over boundaries or landmarks. He was represented with a human head, but without feet or arms, to intimate that he never moved from whatever place he occupied.

Termoli (tār-mō-lē). A seaport in the province of Campobasso, Italy, situated on the Adriatic in lat. 42° N. Population (1881), 3,963.

Ternant (tēr-noñ'). Chevalier Jean de. Died 1816. A French officer. He served in the American Revolution, and was minister to the United States under Washington.

Ternate (tēr-nā'te). 1. A small island in the Moluccas, west of Jilolo, in lat. 0° 47' N., long. 127° 23' E. It is under Dutch control.—2. A Dutch residency, including parts of Celebes, Jilolo, and smaller islands.—3. A seaport in the island of Ternate.

Ternaux-Compans (tēr-nō' kōn-pōñ') (originally Ternaux), Henri. Born at Paris, 1807; died there, Dec., 1864. A French bibliographer and historian. He held diplomatic positions in Spain, Portugal, and Brazil, and at one time was a deputy in the French congress. His collection of books and manuscripts relating to the early history of America was one of the largest ever brought together. His publications include "Bibliothèque Andricaine," a catalogue of books relating to America published previous to 1700 (1836); "Voyages, relations et mémoires originaux pour servir à l'histoire de la découverte de l'Amérique," French translations of documents from his collection, of great value (2 series, in 20 vols., 1836-40); etc.

Terni (tēr-nē). A town in the province of Perugia, Italy, situated between two arms of the Nera, 47 miles north by east of Rome; the ancient Interamna. It has a cathedral and the ruins of a Roman amphitheater, and many other antiquities. Near it are the Falls of the Velino. It was the birthplace of the emperors Tacitus and Florian, and perhaps of the historian Tacitus. Here, Nov. 27, 1798, the French defeated the Neapolitans. Population (1881), commune, 15,553.

Terni, Falls of. See Marmorce.

Terodant. See Tarudant.

Teror (tā-rōr'). A small town in the island of Gran Canaria, Canary Islands.

Terpander (tēr-pān' dēr). [Gr. Τέρπανδρος.] Born at Antissa, Lesbos; lived in the first half of the 7th century B. C. A famous Lesbian musician and lyric poet, settled in Sparta; called "the father of Greek music," perhaps from his development of the lyre.

We know nothing of Terpander's youth, save that he was born in Lesbos, the real home of melic poetry, and came, or was called, to Sparta, where he established the musical contests at the Karnian festival about 670 B. C. (Ol. 26). He was said to have been victor at the Pythian contests for four consecutive eight-year feasts, which brings down his activity at least to the year 640 B. C. Thus we may imagine him the older contemporary of Tyrteus. Not twenty lines of his hymns remain—solemn fragments in hexameters or heavy spondaic meters, which show that hymns to the gods (hymnes) were his chief productions. Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I, 167.

Terpsichore (tērp-sik' ō-rē). [Gr. Τερψιχόρη, delighting in the dance.] In classical mythology, one of the Muses, the especial companion of Melpomene, and the patroness of the choral dance and of the dramatic chorus developed from it. In the last days of the Greek religion her attributions became restricted chiefly to the province of lyric poetry. In art this Muse is represented as a graceful figure, clad in flowing draperies, often seated, and usually bearing a lyre. Her lyre is closely akin to that of Erato, but the latter is always shown standing.

Terra (tēr' ā). [L., 'earth.'] In Roman mythology, a goddess, the personification of the earth.

Terracina (tēr-rā-chē'nā). A town in the province of Rome, Italy, situated on the Mediterranean 58 miles southeast of Rome; the ancient Anxur or Tarracina. It has a cathedral and the ruins of a castle of Theodoric. (See Tarracina.) Population (1881), commune, 8,572.

Terracina, Gulf of. An arm of the Mediterranean, near Terracina.

Terra Firma (tēr' ā-jā' fēr-mij). [L., 'solid ground,'] A name sometimes given to (a) the part of the mainland of Italy that was formerly subject to Venice; (b) the region known in Spanish as Tierra Firme. See Spanish Main.

Terranova, or Terranova di Sicilia (tēr-rā-nō' vij dē sē-chō'lē-it), or Terranuova (tēr-rā-nō' ō' vij). [It., 'new land.'] A seaport in the province of Caltanissetta, Sicily, situated on the southern coast 56 miles west of Syracuse. It has some trade. It was founded by the emperor Frederick II, near the ancient Gela. Population (1881), 16,440; commune, 17,173.

Terranova. A small town on the northeastern coast of the island of Sardinia.

Terrasson (tēr-ā-sōñ'). A town in the department of Dordogne, France, situated on the Vézère 30 miles east by south of Périgueux. Population (1891), commune, 3,864.

Terre (tār). La. [F., 'the earth.'] A novel by Zola, published in 1887.

"La Terre" was by common consent his farthest excursion, and is perhaps the farthest excursion possible on the quest after a representation of man and nature which shall be not disrealised but disidealised, which shall be confined to the merely ugly, base, and low, to the study of degradation and deformity, and to the study even of these things from what may be called the purely police-court and reporter point of view. Sainsbury, French Novelists, p. 6.

Terre Haute (tēr' ē hōt). [F., 'high land.'] A city, capital of Vigo County, Indiana, situated on the Wabash 72 miles west-southwest of Indianapolis. It is an important railroad and manufacturing center, and contains the State Normal School, Rose Polytechnic Institute, etc. It was settled by French colonists. Population (1900), 36,673.

Terre Noire (tār-nwār'). [F., 'black country.'] An industrial commune in the department of Loire, France, east of St.-Étienne. Population (1891), 4,944.

Terror (tēr' or). An arctic exploring vessel which sailed from England with the Erebus under Sir John Franklin in 1845. A document was discovered on the shore of King William's Land by Captain McClintock, stating that both ships were abandoned about a year after the death of Sir John Franklin in 1847, and that the survivors had started for the Great Fish River. They all perished on their journey southward. No traces of the vessels appear to have been found. The Erebus and Terror had previously been the vessels of the Antarctic expedition under command of Sir James Clark Ross.

Terror, The. See Reign of Terror.

Terror of the World. A name given to Attila.

Terry (tēr' i). Alfred Howe. Born at Hartford, Conn., Nov. 10, 1827; died at New Haven, Conn., Dec. 16, 1890. An American general. He was educated at the Yale law school; became a colonel of militia in 1854; served at the first battle of Bull Run, at the capture of Port Royal, and at the siege of Fort Pulaski in 1861; took part as brigadier-general in the operations against Charleston in 1862; was a division and corps commander in Virginia in 1864; served at Brury's Bluff, Bermuda Hundred, the siege of Petersburg, and elsewhere; captured Fort Fisher by assault Jan. 15, 1865; served at the capture of Wilmington, and as corps commander under Sherman in 1865; and later was department (Dakota and the South) and division commander. In 1876 he commanded a successful expedition against Sitting Bull. He was made major-general in the regular army in 1886, and retired in 1888.

Terry, Ellen. Born at Coventry, Feb. 27, 1847. A popular English actress. She made her first appearance on the stage with Charles Kean's company in 1858 in the parts of Manilius in "The Winter's Tale" and Prince Arthur in "King John." She appeared in London in 1863 as Gertrude in "The Little Treasure." In 1864 she married and left the stage, but reappeared in 1867. In 1875 she made her first appearance at the Lyceum with Henry Irving, and has since been associated with him in all his successful Shakspearian productions, and as Camilla in Tennyson's "The Cup" and Rosamonde in his "Becket." She has visited America with Mr. Irving on his tours in 1886, 1893, 1895, 1899, 1901. She is best in high comedy.

Terry Alts (tēr' i alts). A body of rebels who appeared in County Clare, Ireland, about the beginning of the 19th century.

Terschelling (tēr-schēl' ling). An island in the North Sea, belonging to the Netherlands, situated northwest of Friesland and west of Ameland. Length, 15 miles.

Tersteegen (tēr-stā' gen). Gerhard. Born at Mörs, Prussia, Nov. 25, 1697; died at Mülheim, Prussia, April 3, 1769. A German hymn-writer. His hymns were included in "Blumengärtlein" (1729).

Tersus. See Tursus.

Tertre, Jean Baptiste du. See Dutertre.

Tertullian (tēr-tul' yan) (Quintus Septimius Florens Tertullianus). Born at Carthage about 150 A. D.; died about 230. A celebrated ecclesiastical writer, one of the fathers of the Latin Church. He became converted to Christianity about 192; lived in Rome and Carthage; and became a Montanist about 203. His chief work is his "Apologétique," a defense of Christianity called forth by the persecutions under Septimius Severus. Among his other works are "Ad Martyres," "De Baptismo," "De Penitentiā," "De Spectaculis," "De Patientiā," "De Præscrip'tione," "Adversus Marcionem," "De Virginibus velandis," "Adversus Praxean."

Tertullianists (tēr-tul' yan-ists). A branch of the African Montanists of the 3d and 4th centuries, who held the doctrines of Montanism as modified by Tertullian. The divergence of the Tertullianists from orthodox seems to have been much less marked than that of the original Asiatic Montanists. They called themselves "Pneumatics," or spiritual men, and the Catholics "Psychics," natural or sensual men.

Terudant. See Tarudant.

Teruel (tēr-ē-ol'). 1. A province in Aragon, Spain. It is bounded by Saragossa on the north, Tarragona on the east, Castellon on the southeast, Valencia on the south, and Cuenca and Guadalajara on the west, and is traversed by mountain-chains. Area, 5,491 square miles. Population (1887), 241,865.

2. The capital of the province of Teruel, situated on the Guadalaviar in lat. 40° 23' N., long. 1° 12' W. It has a medieval cathedral. Population (1887), 9,423.

Teschén (tesh'en), Slav. Cieszyn (tsésh'in). A manufacturing town in Austrian Silesia, situated on the Olsa 61 miles west-southwest of Cracow. It was the capital of the ancient duchy of Teschen, and has a ruined castle. A treaty concluded here, May 13, 1779, between Austria and Prussia, which terminated the War of the Bavarian Succession, is known as the peace of Teschen. Population (1890), commune, 15,230.

Tesla (tes'lá), Nikola. Born at Smiljan, Lika, Austria-Hungary, in 1857. A noted physicist and electrician. He came to the United States in 1884 with a view of developing motors based on his discovery of the rotating magnetic field: this he completed in 1888. He has invented a number of methods and appliances in the line of electrical vibrations aiming at the production of efficient light with lamps without filaments, and the production and transmission of power and intelligence without wires. On his discovery of the action of air or gaseous matter when subjected to rapidly alternating electrostatic stresses is based the modern art of insulating currents of very high tension. He has also constructed steam-engines and electrical generators (oscillators) with which otherwise unattainable results are obtained.

Tessin. See Ticino.

Testament (tes'ta-ment). A collection of books containing the history and doctrines of the Mosaic or old dispensation and of the Christian or new, in two divisions, known severally as the Old Testament and the New Testament. The word testament in the authorized version of the Bible always represents the Greek word διαθήκη (elsewhere rendered 'covenant'), which in early Christian Latin, and regularly in the Vulgate, is rendered 'testamentum,' perhaps from its use in Heb. ix. 15-20.

Testament of Love. A prose work, wrongly attributed by Speght to Chaucer. It purports to be written by a prisoner in danger of being hanged, and dates probably from the end of the 14th century.

Teste-de-Buch (test-dè-büsh'), La. A town in the department of Gironde, France, situated on the Basin of Arcachon 32 miles west-southwest of Bordeaux. Population (1891), commune, 6,480.

Tetry, or Testri (tes-tré'). A small place in northern France, situated near the Somme, north of Soissons. Here, in 687, Pepin of Herstal overthrew the power of Neustria.

Tête-Noire (tât-nwâr'). [F., 'black head,'] An Alpine pass on the frontiers of Savoy and Switzerland, leading from Martigny to the valley of Chamonix. It is so called from a mountain of the same name near the pass. Height, 4,997 feet.

Têtes Plates. See Choctaws.

Tethys (tê'this). [Gr. Τηθύς.] A sea-goddess. Tethys. The third satellite of Saturn, discovered by Cassini, March, 1684.

Teton (te-tôn' or tē'ton). A river in northern Montana which joins the Missouri northeast of Fort Benton. Length, about 150 miles.

Tetons. See Three Tetons.

Teton, Grand. See Hayden, Mount.

Teton Range. A mountain-range in the Rocky Mountain system, near the borders of Idaho and Wyoming, north of the Snake River.

Tetrapolis (te-trap'ô-lis). Chaldean. [Gr. Τετραπόλις, a name applied to several groups of four cities.] The four cities Babylon, Erech, Akkad, and Calneh.

Tetrapolitan (tet-ra-pol'i-tan) Confession. A confession of faith presented at the Diet of Augsburg in 1530 by the representatives of the four cities (whence the name) Constance, Lindau, Memmingen, and Strasburg. It resembled the Augsburg Confession, but inclined somewhat to Zwinglian views.

Tetricus (tet'ri-kus). A pretender to the Roman Empire who usurped the throne in Gaul about 267-270 A. D.

Tetschen (tet'shen). A town in Bohemia, situated on the Elbe 49 miles north by west of Prague. It is a center for the upper Elbe navigation, and a tourist center for the Saxon-Bohemian Switzerland. Population (1890), commune, 7,299.

Tetuan (tet-â-in'). A town in Morocco, situated on the river Martil, near its mouth in the Mediterranean, 25 miles southeast of Tangier. It has manufactures of guns. Here, Feb. 4, 1860, the Spaniards under O'Donnell gained a decisive victory over the troops of Morocco. Population, estimated, 20,000 to 25,000.

Tetzel, or Tezel (tet'sel), Johann (properly Diez, Diezel, etc.). Born at Leipzig about 1455; died 1519. A German Dominican monk and inquisitor. The scandal of his sale of indulgences led to the publication of Luther's ninety-five theses at Wittenberg in 1517, and to the German Reformation. See Luther.

Teucer (tū'sér). [Gr. Τεῦκρος.] In Greek legend: (a) A son of Scamander, and the first king of Troy. (b) A son of Telamon and step-brother of Ajax: noted as an archer. He was said to have founded Salamis in Cyprus.

Teufelsbrücke (toi'felz-brük-e). German for Devil's Bridge (which see).

Teufelsdröckh (toi'felz-drök), Herr. A German philosopher, the central character in Carlyle's "Sartor Resartus."

Teuffel (toi'fel), Wilhelm Sigismund. Born at Ludwigsburg, Würtemberg, Sept. 27, 1820; died at Tübingen, March 8, 1878. A German philologist, literary historian, and archaeologist: professor of classical philology at Tübingen from 1849. His chief work is "Geschichte der römischen Litteratur" ("History of Roman Literature," 1868-70).

Teul, or Gran Teul (grän tä-öl'). A small town in the state of Zacatecas, Mexico, 17 miles south-southwest of Tlaltemango. It was the capital and largest town of the Nayarits, and was burned by the Spaniards about 1530.

Teulada (tä-ö-lá'dá), Cape. A cape at the southern extremity of the island of Sardinia, west of Cape Spartivento.

Teumman (tä-öm'män). King of Elam. He succeeded his brother Urtaki. In the battle of Ulai (the classical Eulaeus) he was defeated by the Assyrian king Assurbanipal (668-626 B.C.); and in the triumphal procession of Assurbanipal, Teumman's head was suspended by a string around the neck of one of his chief allies and friends.

Teutobod (tū'tō-bod). A king of the Teutones, totally defeated by Marius at the battle of Aquæ Sextiæ, 102 B. C.

Teutoburgerwald (toi'tō-börg-er-vält). A mountain-range in Germany, extending from the vicinity of Osnabrück in Hannover south-east through Westphalia and Lippe. It is known in different parts as the Lippischer Wald, Osning, etc. The Egge, to the south, is sometimes included. A victory was gained in this range (exact locality undetermined) in 9 A. D. by the Germans under Arminius (Hermann) over the Romans under Varus, the Roman army being nearly annihilated. Highest point, about 1,500 feet.

Teutones (tū'tō-néz), or Teutoni (tū'tō-nī). In ancient history, a Germanic people who, with the Cimbr, defeated several Roman armies at the end of the 2d century B. C., and were nearly destroyed by Marius at Aquæ Sextiæ, 102 B. C. They are mentioned later as dwelling near the lower Elbe and eastward.

We have a Teutonic parallel of the same etymological origin in the Gothic "thiundans," . . . Norse "thjóðann," "a king," and A-Saxon "theoden," which also meant a king or lord: both the Norse and the A-Saxon words are found only in poetry, which is an indication that they are very ancient formations, going back probably far behind the time of Ulfilas, as may be shown by approaching the question from another direction: the word tonta and its congeners entered into many proper names, and when the Romans had to write these names they represented the Teutonic dental, as they did the Gaulish one, as a simple t; witness Caesar's Tentones, Ammianus Marcellinus' Teutomeræ, Eutropius' Teutobodus, and Florus' Teutobochus. Now in Teutones or Tentoni we have the plural, as given by Roman authors, of the word "thiundans," "thjóðann," and "theoden"; and that a people should have given themselves such a name as Teutones, meaning kings, will surprise no one who has noticed such Celtic names as that of the Remi, which signified princes; those of the Caturiges and Catuvellauni, meaning war-kings or battle-princes; and that of the Eburiges, which actually meant Welt-herrscher, or lords of the world. This explanation of the origin of the modern term Teutonic is doubtless open to the objection of implying that a natural inclination to brag was not quite confined to the Celt.

Rhys, Celtic Heathendom, p. 46.

Teutonic Order. See Order.

Tevastehus. See Tarastehus.

Teverone. See Anio.

Teviot (tê'vi-ot). A river in Roxburghshire which joins the Tweed near Kelso. Length, about 40 miles.

Teviotdale (tê'vi-ot-däl). A name often given to Roxburghshire.

Tewa (tä'wä), or Taywah, or Tegua, or Tehua. ['Houses,'] A division of the Taönoan linguistic stock of North American Indians, occupying the pueblos of Pojoaque, Nambé, San Ildefonso, San Juan, Santa Clara, and Tesuque, in the Rio Grande valley, New Mexico, and the pueblo of Hano which forms one of the Tusayan group in northeastern Arizona. Number (1893), 1,100.

Tewfik Pasha (tü'fik pash'â), Mohammed. Born Nov. 15, 1852; died in his palace near Cairo, Egypt, Jan. 7, 1892. Khedive of Egypt, son of Ismail Pasha whom he succeeded June 26, 1879. From his accession until 1882 Egyptian finances continued under Anglo-French control. In that year occurred the rebellion of Arabi Pasha. Its suppression by the British marked the cessation of French influence, and the virtual establishment of a British protectorate. The revolt of the Mahdists led, in spite of British expeditions, to the loss of the upper Nile and Sudan regions in 1884-1885. He was succeeded by his eldest son, Abbas Pasha.

Tewkesbury (tüks'bu-ri). A town in Gloucestershire, England, situated at the junction of the Avon and Severn, 10 miles northeast of Gloucester: the Roman Etoessa. The abbey church, chiefly of the 12th century, is one of the most important of English Romanesque structures. The exterior is marked by its massive tower, its beautiful radiating choir-chapels in the Decorated style, and the curious recessed porch and window of the west front. The interior is highly effective, and possesses excellent 14th-century glass and medieval monuments. A victory was gained here May 4, 1471, by the Yorkists under Edward IV. over the Lancastrians under Margaret of Anjou and Prince Edward; by it Edward was reestablished on the throne. Population (1891), 5,269.

Tewkesbury Chronicle. A chronicle, chiefly of English ecclesiastical history, kept at the Abbey of Tewkesbury, 1066-1263.

Texarkana (teks-är-kan'ä). The capital of Miller County, in the southwestern extremity of Arkansas, situated partly in Texas. It is a railroad center. Population (1900), in Arkansas, 4,914; in Texas, 5,256.

Texas (tek'sas). One of the South Central States of the United States of America. Capital, Austin; chief seaport, Galveston. It is bounded by Oklahoma and Indian Territory on the north, Arkansas on the northeast (separated by the Red River), Louisiana and the Gulf of Mexico on the east, the Gulf of Mexico on the south, Mexico (separated by the Rio Grande) on the southwest, and New Mexico on the west. It is the largest State in the Union, comprising a low coast region, a prairie country, a central hilly region, high plains to the north and west (including the staked plain), and a mountainous region west of the Pecos. The chief rivers are the Canadian, Red River, Sabine, Trinity, Brazos, Colorado, Nueces, and Rio Grande. It is an important agricultural State, the leading products being cotton, Indian corn, live stock, sugar, and rice. It has 243 counties, sends 2 senators and 16 representatives to Congress, and has 18 electoral votes. An attempt at settlement was made by La Salle about 1685, and various missions were established by the Spaniards in the 18th century. The region was invaded by various adventurers early in the 19th century. It formed with Coahuila a state of Mexico, and was settled rapidly about 1820-30 by American colonists. A rebellion against Mexico broke out in 1835; the garrisons at the Alamo and Goliad were massacred by the Mexicans in 1836; and the Mexicans were finally defeated by Houston at San Jacinto, April 21, 1836. Texas was a republic from 1836 to 1845, when it was annexed to the United States. It was the scene of early events in the Mexican war in 1846; seceded Feb. 1, 1861; was the scene of various events in the Rebellion, and of the last conflicts; and was readmitted in 1870. Area, 265,780 square miles. Population (1900), 3,048,710.

Texcocans. See Texcocans.

Texcoco. See Tezcuco.

Texel (tek'sel). An island in the North Sea, belonging to the Netherlands. It lies north of North Holland (separated by the Marsdiep). The surface is low. Its neighborhood has been the scene of many naval engagements. Length, 15 miles. Population, about 6,000.

Texier (tes-yä'). Charles Félix Marie. Born at Versailles, France, Aug. 29, 1802; died at Paris, July 1, 1871. A French archaeologist and traveler. Among his works are "Description de l'Asie Mineure" (1839-48), "Description de l'Arménie, de la Perse, de la Mésopotamie" (1842-45), etc.

Teyde, Pico de. See Pico de Teyde.

Tezcatlipoca (täth-kät-lê-pô'kä). In Aztec (Mexican) mythology, one of the supreme gods, the soul of the world and its creator, supposed to be endowed with perpetual youth. On the teocalli at Mexico he had a chapel near that of Huitzilopochtli. Occasional human sacrifices were made to him. The victim (said by some to represent the god himself) was selected a year before, and was a young man of perfect form. He was kept under a kind of tutelage for the ceremony, but was allowed every pleasure; beautiful girls were given him for companions; and at feasts he was honored as a divinity. On the day of the sacrifice he was stripped of his gaudy clothes, and while ascending to the temple threw away his chaplets of flowers and broke his musical instruments.

Tezcotzinco (täth-köt-sên'kô). A hill about 5 miles east of the town of Tezcuco, Mexico. It was a garden or park and country residence of the ancient chiefs of Tezcuco. Ixtlilxochitl describes it as a place of wonderful beauty, adorned with fountains, baths, and palaces: but this description is probably exaggerated. It is said to have been a favorite retreat of Netzahualcoyotl (which see). The place is marked by a few ruins overgrown with vegetation. Some small artificial pools are erroneously called the Baths of Montezuma.

Texcocans (täth-kô'kans), or Texcocans (täth-kô'kans), or Acolhuans (ä-kô'l'ô-ans). An ancient Nahuatl tribe of the valley of Mexico. Some traditions make them the offspring of the semi-mythical race called Chichimecs. About 1220 they settled at Tenaycan or Tezcuco, then on the eastern shore of the lake, and this soon became the most powerful pueblo of the valley. Early in the 15th century they were, for a time, conquered by the Tepanecs; subsequently they joined in a league with Tenochtitlan and Ilacopan, and eventually became subordinate in power to the former place. Their last chief or "king," Ixtlilxochitl, joined Cortés in 1520, and assisted in the siege of Tenochtitlan or Mexico. The Texcocan historians claim for their nation a preeminence in civilization among the Nahuatl tribes.

Tezcuco (täth-kô'kô), or Texcoco (täth-kô'kô). A town of the state and republic of Mexico, near the eastern shore of Tezcuco Lake, about 16 miles from Mexico City. It was the ancient capital of the Texcocans or Acolhuans, who called it Acolhuacan or Tenaycan. (See Texcocans.) At this place, in 1521, Cortés organized the siege of Mexico and built the brigantines with which he assaulted that city from the lake. Population (1889), with the commune, 15,865.

Tezucuo, or Texcoco, Lake of. The largest of the cluster of lakes in the valley of Mexico. At present it is nearly oval in outline, about 12 miles long, 7 wide, and less than 2 feet deep. Mexico City is about 4 miles from the western shore, and Tezucuo is about the same distance from the eastern side. Low and more or less swampy lands around it mark its ancient limits, which were at least four times as great as at present; Mexico was then on an island in it, approached by causeways, and Tezucuo, Tlacopan, and other towns were on its shore. The water was deep enough in 1520 to float the ships of Cortés. During the Aztec and early colonial periods it was frequently swelled by rains, causing disastrous floods in Mexico; one of these floods lasted 3 years (1629-32). The shrinkage is due to filling in with sediment, drainage, and evaporation. Until 1893 the drains of Mexico opened into the lake, and its polluted waters, forced back through them during the rains, caused great mortality in the city. This has been remedied by extensive drainage works, and it is now proposed to empty the lake entirely. Tezucuo is the lowest of the valley lakes, and its waters are brackish. It has no fish, but the singular amphibian called the axolotl was formerly abundant.

Tezel. See Tetzel.

Thacher (thach'ér), George. Born at Yarmouth, Maine, April 12, 1754; died at Biddeford, Maine, April 6, 1824. An American jurist and politician. He was a delegate from Massachusetts to the Continental Congress; was member of Congress from the Maine district of Massachusetts 1789-1801; and was judge of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts and of Maine.

Thacher, Thomas Anthony. Born at Hartford, Conn., Jan. 11, 1815; died at New Haven, Conn., April 7, 1886. An American classical scholar, professor of Latin at Yale from 1842. He translated Madvig's Latin grammar, and edited various Latin works.

Thackeray (thak'g-ri), William Makepeace. Born at Calcutta, July 18, 1811; died at London, Dec. 24, 1863. A celebrated English novelist, satirist, and critic. He went to England when about 5 years old, and was educated at the Charterhouse school and at Trinity College, Cambridge, leaving in 1830. He traveled on the Continent (visiting Weimar, etc.) for several years. In 1833 he began to devote himself seriously to literature and art, wrote for the "National Standard" (of which he was afterward both editor and proprietor) and later for "The Times," for "Fraser's Magazine" (to which he long contributed as Michael Angelo Titmarsh) for "Punch," etc. He had a talent for drawing and caricature, and about 1834 went to Paris, with the idea of studying painting. In this he was unsuccessful; but he illustrated many of his own works, and about 1835 made his well-known application to illustrate "Pickwick." In 1837, having married Miss Isabella Shave, he returned to England. About 1840 his wife's mind became affected, after the birth of her third daughter, and she never recovered, though she did not die until many years after her husband's death. He visited the East in 1844, lectured in the United States in 1852-53 and 1854-55, and was editor of the "Cornhill Magazine" 1860-62. His chief novels are "Vanity Fair" (1846-48; which made his reputation), "Pendennis" (1848-50), "Henry Esmond" (1852), "The Newcomes" (1853-55), and "The Virginians" (1857-1859). Among his other novels and stories are "The Yellowplush Papers" (1837), "History of Mr. Samuel Titmarsh and the Great Hoggarty Diamond" (1837-38), "The Paris Sketch Book" (1840), "Jeames's Diary," "Fitz-Boodle's Confessions," "Shabby Genteel Story," "The Book of Snobs" (collected from "Punch" 1848), "The Irish Sketch Book" (1843), "Notes of a Journey from Cornhill to Grand Cairo" (1846), "Memoirs of Barry Lyndon" (1844), "Mrs. Perkins's Ball" (1847), "Punch's Prize Novelists," "The Kickleburys on the Rhine," "Rebecca and Rowena," "Love the Widower" (1860-61), "Adventures of Philip" (1861-62), "The Rose and the King," and "Deois Duval" (unfinished). Many of these appeared first in "Fraser's," "Cornhill," and other periodicals. His other works include "English Humourists of the 18th Century" (first delivered as lectures in 1851), "The Four Georges" (lectures delivered in the United States 1855, first printed in 1860), "The Roundabout Papers" (1862), "Early and Late Papers" (edited by J. T. Fields, 1867), "The Orphan of Pimlico, etc." (edited 1875), ballads, etc.

Thaddæus (tha-dô'us). [Gr. Θεοδῶτος.] One of the apostles, otherwise called Jude or Judas and Lebbæus. See Jude.

Thaddeus of Warsaw. A novel by Jane Porter, published in 1803; named from its hero.

Thais (thá'is). [Gr. Θαῖς.] Lived in the last part of the 4th century B. C. A famous Athenian hetæra, mistress of Alexander the Great. She is alleged (probably erroneously) to have incited him to fire the Persian palace at Persepolis. She was afterward mistress of Ptolemy Lagus.

Thaisa (thá'is-ä). The daughter of Simonides and wife of Pericles in Shakspeare's (?) "Pericles."

Thalaba the Destroyer. A descriptive poem by Southey; so called from the name of the hero.

Thalberg (täl'berg), Sigismund. Born at Geneva, 1812; died at Naples, 1871. A pianist and composer for the piano, illegitimate son of Prince von Dietrichstein. His works include various fantasias, nocturnes, etc.

Thale (tä'le). A watering-place in the province of Saxony, Prussia, situated in the Harz, on the Bode, 5 miles west of Quedlinburg. Population (1890), 6,292.

Thales (thä'léz). [Gr. Θαλῆς.] Born at Miletus,

Asia Minor, about 640 B. C.; died about 546. A famous Greek philosopher, astronomer, and geometer; one of the seven wise men of Greece, and the earliest of the Ionian natural philosophers. He regarded water as the principle of all things. He predicted an eclipse of the sun for May 28, 585 B. C.; and to him were attributed various discoveries in geometry and astronomy.

Volney considered the eclipse [of Thales] to have taken place B. C. 625 ("Recherches, etc.," vol. i. p. 342). Clinton places it B. C. 603 (F. H. vol. i. p. 419). Ideler considers that no eclipse about this period fulfills the necessary conditions except that of B. C. 610 ("Handbuch der Chronologie," vol. i. p. 204). Mr. Hind and Professor Airy have recently suggested the late date of B. C. 585 (Bosanquet, "Fall of Niueveh," p. 14). Railinson, Herod., i. 359, note.

Thales, or Thaletas (tha-lé'tas). [Gr. Θαλῆς, Θαλῆτας.] Born in Crete; lived about the 7th century B. C. A lyric poet and musician of Sparta.

Thalia (thā-lī'ä). [Gr. Θάλεια, Θάλια.] 1. In Greek mythology, the joyful Muse, to whom is due the bloom of life. She inspired gaiety; was the patroness of the banquet accompanied by song and music; and also favored rural pursuits and pleasures. At a late period she became the Muse of comedy, and to the Romans was little known in any other character. In the later art she is generally represented with a comic mask, a shepherd's crook, and a wreath of ivy.

2. An asteroid (No. 23) discovered at London by Hind, Dec. 15, 1852.

Thallo (thal'ö). [Gr. Θαλλώ.] In Greek mythology, one of the Hours.

Thame (tām). A river in Buckinghamshire and Oxfordshire, England, which joins the Thames (of which it is a main tributary) at Dorchester. Length, about 35 miles.

Thame. A town in Oxfordshire, England, situated on the Thame 13 miles east of Oxford. Population (1891), 3,335.

Thames (temz). [Early mod. E. also Thamys, Tames, Temse, ME. Temes, AS. Temes, Temese, Tæmese, L. Tamesis (Cæsar), Tamesa (Tacitus), Gr. Ταμίσις or Ταμῆσις (Dion Cassius), and said to be Celtic, meaning 'broad water.' The F. Tamise is from the L. G. Themse from the E.] The principal river in Great Britain. It rises near Cirencester; flows on the border between Gloucester and Wiltshire; separates Oxford and Buckingham from Berkshire, Middlesex from Surrey, and Essex from Kent; and, broadening into an estuary, flows into the North Sea. Its course is generally easterly. To its junction with the Thame it is called also the Isis. The principal tributaries are the Cherwell, Thame, Colne, Lea, and Roddington on the north, and the Kennet, Mole, and Medway on the south. The chief places on its banks are Oxford, Reading, Windsor, Eton, Kingston, Richmond, Brentford, London, Woolwich, Gravesend, and Sheerness. Length to Sheerness, 228 miles. Width at London Bridge, 900 feet; at Gravesend, half a mile. It is tidal to Teddington, and is navigable by locks for barges from Lechlade; for large vessels, from the Pool, London.

Thames. A river in Ontario, Canada, which flows into Lake St. Clair 32 miles east of Detroit. Near its banks, Oct. 5, 1813, the Americans under Harrison (cavalry under R. M. Johnson) defeated the allied British (under Proctor) and Indians (under Tecumseh, who was killed in the battle). Length, about 160 miles; navigable to Chatham.

Thames (thāmz). A navigable river in Connecticut, formed by the junction at Norwich of the Quinebaug and the Yantic. It empties into Long Island Sound below New London. Length, 15 miles.

Thames Embankment. A wide macadamized carriage-way, with foot-pavements on each side, constructed 1864-70 by the Metropolitan Board of Works in London along the north bank of the Thames, from Blackfriars Bridge to Westminster. Strictly this is the Victoria Embankment, while the Albert Embankment, finished 1868, extends from Westminster Bridge to Vauxhall Bridge on the south bank, and the Chelsea Embankment, finished 1873, extends from the Chelsea Hospital to the Albert Suspension Bridge on the north bank. These embankments have a granite wall on the river side; the whole area was once covered by the tide.

Thames Tunnel. A tunnel under the Thames at London, near the Tower, opened in 1843.

Thamien (thā'mi-en). A tribe of North American Indians which formerly inhabited the country between the Almaden mines and Alviso Landing, Santa Clara County, California; also, the native name of the site of Santa Clara mission. See Costanoan.

Thammuz. See Tammuz.

Thamyris (tham'ī-ris). [Gr. Θάμυρις.] In Greek legend, a Thracian singer. He boasted that he could surpass the Muses, and was deprived by them of his sight and of the power of singing.

Thanatopsis (than-ä-top'sis). [From Gr. θάνατος and ὄψις, vision: 'a vision of death.'] A poem by William Cullen Bryant, published in 1816.

Thanatos (than'ä-tos). [Gr. Θάνατος, death.] In Greek mythology, the personification of death, brother of Sleep. See Sleep and Death.

Thanet (than'et), Isle of. An island at the eastern extremity of Kent, England. It is formed by a bifurcation of the Stour, and contains Margate and Ramsgate (so called from Raim, the older name of the island). Length, 9 miles.

Thanet, Octave. The pseudonym of Alice French.

Thann (tän). A town in Upper Alsace, Alsace-Lorraine, situated on the Thur 23 miles southwest of Kolmar. It has manufactures of cotton and silk, and wine is produced in the vicinity. Its church of St. Theobald is noteworthy. Population (1890), 7,425.

Thano. See Tano.

Thapsacus (thap'sa-kus). In ancient geography, a town on the western bank of the Euphrates; the biblical Tiptsah. It was probably situated near the modern Rakka, about lat. 35° 50' N. The Euphrates was crossed here in the expedition of Cyrus the Younger, by Darius, and by Alexander the Great.

Thapsus (thap'sus). In ancient geography, a town in northern Africa, situated on the coast, near the modern Cape Dimas in Tunis, 30 miles southeast of Susa. Here, 46 B. C., Caesar totally defeated the Pompeians under Cato, Scipio, and Juba, and ended the war in Africa.

Tharand (tä'ränt). A small town in the kingdom of Saxony, situated on the Wilde Weisseritz, 9 miles southwest of Dresden. It is the seat of a noted academy of forestry.

Thargelia (thär-gé'li-ä). [Gr. Θαργῆλια.] In Greek antiquity, a festival celebrated at Athens on the 6th and 7th of the month Thargelion, in honor of the Delian Apollo and of Artemis. On the first day of the festival (probably not every year) there was an expiatory sacrifice of two persons, for the men and the women of the state respectively, the victims being condemned criminals; on the second day there were a procession and a contest for a tripod between cyclic choruses provided by the choragi.

Tharrawaddy (thar-a-wod'i). A district in Pegu division, British Burma, intersected by lat. 18° N. Area, 2,014 square miles. Population (1891), 347,454.

Thasos (thä'sos). [Gr. Θάσος.] 1. An island in the northern part of the Ægean Sea, intersected by lat. 40° 40' N. It belongs to Turkey, and is about 4 miles from the mainland. The surface is mountainous. It was colonized from Paros about the end of the 8th century B. C.; was long noted for its gold-mines; belonged to the Athenian confederacy; revolted about 465 B. C., but was besieged and subdued by Cimon; was subject to Philip V. of Macedon; and was a free city under the Romans. The inhabitants (Greeks) number about 10,000.

2. The ancient capital of Thasos, situated on the northern coast.

Thatcher (thach'ér), Benjamin Bussey. Born at Warren, Maine, Oct. 8, 1809; died at Boston, July 14, 1848. An American author. His works include "Biography of North American Indians" (1832), "Tales of the American Revolution" (1846), etc.

Thatcher, Henry Knox. Born at Thomaston, Maine, May 26, 1806; died at Boston, April 5, 1880. An American rear-admiral. He served in the attacks on Fort Fisher, and commanded the Western Gulf Squadron in the naval operations against Mobile in 1865.

Thau (tô), Étang de. A lake in the department of Hérault, southern France, situated near the Mediterranean (with which it communicates by a canal) near Cette. Length, 12 miles.

Thaumaturgus (thä-mä-tér'gus). [L., from Gr. θαυματουργός, wonder-working.] A surname given to Gregory of Cappadocia (3d century), a reputed worker of miracles.

Thaumaturgus of the West, The. A name given to St. Bernard.

Thaxter (thaks'tér), Mrs. (Celia Leighton). Born at Portsmouth, N. H., 1835; died at the Isles of Shoals, Aug. 26, 1894. An American poet. She wrote "Among the Isles of Shoals," "Driftweed," "Poems for Children," etc.

Thayer (thär), Abbott Henderson. Born at Boston, Aug. 12, 1849. An American animal-, figure-, and landscape-painter. He was a student at the Ecole des Beaux Arts under Lehmann and Gérôme from 1875 to 1879. Upon his return to America he settled in New York, and was made president of the Society of American Artists.

Thayer, Joseph Henry. Born at Boston, Nov. 7, 1828; died Nov. 26, 1901. An American biblical scholar, professor at Andover Theological Seminary 1864-82, and at the Divinity School, Harvard, 1884-1901.

Theætetus (thē-ä-tē'tus). [Gr. Θεαιτητος.] Lived about the end of the 5th century B. C. An Athenian, a disciple of Socrates. He is the principal character in one of the most famous of Plato's dialogues.

Theagenes (thē-ä-j'e-néz). [Gr. Θεαγένης.] A tyrant of Megara, who ruled about the end of the 7th century B. C.

Theagenes and Chariclea (kar-i-klé'ä). An ancient romance by one Heliodorus, written in the 4th century. It recounts the loves and adventures of Theagenes, a Thessalian, and Chariclea, the daughter of Persina queen of Ethiopia. It was rendered into English prose by Thomas Underdown (1577), and into French by Amyot. It "supplied with materials many of the early writers of romance. It was imitated in the composition of Achilles Tatius and subsequent Greek fabulists; and was the model of those heroic fictions which, through the writings of Gomberville and Scudéry, became for a considerable period so popular and prevalent in France" (Dunlop). Also called Ethiopia.

Theatins, or Theatines (thē'a-tinz). [From Theate or Teate, Chieti.] A monastic order of regular clerks, founded at Rome in 1524, principally by the Archbishop of Chieti, in Italy, with the purpose of combating the Reformation. There were also Theatin nuns. The order flourished to some extent in Spain, Bavaria, and Poland, but its influence is now confined chiefly to Italy.

Theatre, The. The first London theater. It was a wooden building erected by James Burbage, the father of Richard Burbage, in 1576, on the site of the priory of St. John the Baptist, Shoreditch, which was destroyed at the Reformation. It was taken down in 1597, and the Globe, Bankside, built of the materials.

Théâtre de la Foire (tā-ātr' dē lā fwā'). [F., 'theater of the fair.'] A theater set up by provincial comedians at the fairs of St.-Germain and St.-Laurent, outside of Paris. These theaters had privileges, in the interests of commerce, which the regular theaters had not. The plays were originally given by marionettes, and their performance can be traced as far back as 1595. Le Sage, Fuselier, Dominique, Dorneval, Boissy, Sedaine, and others wrote for it, Le Sage alone writing more than 100 little pieces, farces, etc., with or without songs.

Théâtre Français (tā-ātr' frōn-sā'), Le. The most noted theater in France. It is situated on the Place du Théâtre Français, Rue St.-Honoré, near the Palais Royal, in Paris. Its rights having been restricted during the Revolution, Napoleon reinstated it in nearly sole possession of the right of producing classic drama. Its present constitution was given to it in 1830, and it is now the chief home of the regular drama, and receives a subsidy from the government. It has a governing board of six, who in turn are supervised by government officials. It was almost entirely destroyed by fire, March 5, 1900. See Comédie Française, La.

Théâtre Italien, or Les Italiens (tā-ātr' ē-tā-lyan' or lāz ē-tā-lyan'). The name given to the old Italian opera-house in the Rue Le Peletier in Paris. For many years the lyric drama was given here. In 1875 the new opera-house was opened.

Theatre Royal. Same as Drury Lane Theatre (which see). It was the first London theater so named.

Thebaid (thē' bā-id), The. [L. Thebais, Gr. Θεβαίς.] In ancient geography, the domain of Thebes in Egypt, or Upper Egypt. It included the valley of the Nile from about lat. 27° 45' N. southward to Syene (about lat. 24° N.).

Thebaid, The. An epic poem by Statius, relating to the expedition of the Seven against Thebes.

This poem, which is admitted by Merivale to be faultless in epic execution, and has been glorified by the admiration of Dante, occupied the author twelve years in the composing, probably from 80 to 92 A. D. Crutwell, Hist. of Roman Lit., p. 427.

Thébaïde (tā-bā-ēd'). La. A play by Racine, produced June 20, 1664, by Molière's company.

Thebais (thē' bā-is). A Greek epic poem of the Theban cycle, of unknown authorship, relating to a mythical war between Argos and Thebes.

Theban (thē'ban) Cycle, The. A group of legends or poems relating to the mythical war between Argos and Thebes. See Cyclic Poets, The.

Theban Eagle, or Theban Bard. Pindar.

Theban Legion. In Christian legend, a legion (from the Thebaid?) in the army of Maximian which refused to obey the emperor's order to persecute the Christians, and was twice decimated and finally exterminated for its disobedience.

Thebaw (thē' bā). The last king of Burma, deposed by the British in 1885.

Thebes (thēbz). [Gr. Θῆβαι, L. Thebæ or Thebe (also Diospolis Magna), Egyptian Uast.] A city of ancient Egypt, situated on both sides of the Nile, in lat. 25° 38' N., long. 32° 39' E. Thebes proper was on the east bank, and the Libyan suburb (Pachyris, Memnonia) on the west bank. The village of Luxor now stands on the site. The remains of antiquity here are of great interest. The Colossi, or statues of Memnon as commonly called, are two huge seated figures, originally monolithic, of Amenhotep III. (about 1500 B. C.), standing, with others now ruined, before the ruined temple of that king. They are about 50 feet high, and are raised on sandstone pedestals measuring about 10 feet. They are now much weather-beaten and broken by earthquake shocks, but have suffered still more from vandalism. The northernmost figure is the famed vocal statue of Memnon, which is said to have emitted a sound when touched by the rays of the rising sun. The temple of Rameses I. and Seti I., or of Amen-Ra, is entered by a dromos of sphinxes between two pylons, the second of which is followed by a similar dromos before the fine prostyle colonnade, whose columns are of the early type resembling stalks bound together. The portal opens on a columned hall surrounded by chambers, beyond which lies a large hall with four columns, preceding the now ruined sanctuary. On both sides of the main temple there are other halls and rooms; those on the west may have formed part of the royal palace. The sculptures, which refer to Rameses I., Seti I., and Rameses II., are of high interest. The tomb of Seti I. (about 1400 B. C.), No. 17 of the Tombs of the Kings (commonly called Belzoni's tomb, from its discoverer), is like its fellows, a rock-cut tomb. At its entrance, which is a mere shaft in the face of the cliff, a long, steep stair descends, followed by a narrow passage, another stair, and another passage, at the end of which there was a deep pit (now filled), the continuation of the passage beyond which was walled up, stuccoed, and painted over with scenes continuing those on the side walls. Beyond is a first hall with four pillars, elaborately sculptured and painted; then another hall, and a series of passages by which is reached the great hall, 27 feet square, with 6 pillars. A vaulted chamber 19 by 30 feet continues this hall, and contained the alabaster sarcophagus of the king. Other columned chambers flank this one, and still other passages and chambers extend on a lower level into the mountain, the total length open being 470 feet, and the depth below the entrance 150. The continuation of the tomb is choked, and its extent is unknown. The sculptures, historical, mythological, and ceremonial, with particular reference to the rites of royal burial, are exceedingly remarkable. With allowance for endless differences of detail, this may be taken as a type of the Tombs of the Kings. The Tombs of the Queens, temple of Rameses III., Memnonium (see Ramesseum), temple of Luxor, temple of Karnak, obelisks, and sphinxes are also noteworthy. Thebes is first mentioned in the 11th dynasty. It supplanted Memphis as the great Egyptian center; was very flourishing in the 18th, 19th, and 20th dynasties (Thothmes III., Amenhotep III., Seti, Rameses II., Rameses III.); was afterward supplanted by cities of the Delta; and declined under the Ptolemies. See Karnak and Luxor.

Thebes. [Gr. Θῆβαι, L. Thebæ or Thebe.] In ancient geography, the chief city of Bœotia, Greece, situated in lat. 35° 19' N., long. 23° 19' E.; the modern Thiva. It is said to have been founded by Cadmus (hence Cadmea, the citadel), and is celebrated in connection with Amphion, Zethus, Laius and Oedipus, and the expeditions of the Seven against Thebes and of the Epigoni. It was early settled by the Bœotians from Thessaly; had a quarrel with Athens at the end of the 6th century B. C.; was allied with the Persians in the Persian war; was defeated by Athens at Oenophyta 456; and was under democratic and Athenian influence until 447; was the bitter enemy of Athens in the Peloponnesian war; had a severe struggle with Sparta in the battle of Coronæ in 394; had to yield to Sparta 382-379; defeated Sparta at Leuctra in 371, and at Mantinea in 362, and held the hegemony in Greece under the leadership of Epaminondas; took part in the Sacred War; was allied with Athens in the defeat at Cheronea in 338, and was severely treated by Philip; rebelled in 335, but was retaken by Alexander and destroyed; was rebuilt by Cassander; became insignificant under the Roman Empire; was important in the middle ages and noted for its silk manufactures; and was plundered by the Normans of Sicily and others. It was the reputed birthplace of Ptolemy, Amphion, Hercules, and Bacchus. Population of the modern town, about 4,000.

Thecla (thek'lā), Saint. A saint of Iconium, Asia Minor, said to have been a disciple of the apostle Paul.

Theia (thē'yā). See Titans.

Theiner (tī'ner), Augustin. Born at Breslau, April 11, 1804; died Aug. 10, 1874. A noted German Roman Catholic historian. He was prefect of the Vatican archives 1855-70. He was suspected of misusing his official position for the advantage of the bishops of the opposition in the Vatican Council, and the key of the archives was taken away from him. He published many ecclesiastical works on the old monuments of Poland, Hungary, Russia, etc.; "Geschichte des Pontificats Clemens XIV." (1853); "Codex diplomaticus domini temporalis Sanctæ Ledis" (1862: on the temporal power of the papacy); etc.

Theiss (tīs), Hung. Tisza (tis'ō). The largest tributary of the Danube: the Slavonian Tisa, and the ancient Pathissus, or Tissus, or Tisia (less probably Tibiscus). It is formed by the union of the Black Theiss and White Theiss in the Carpathians on the border of Galicia; flows west, southwest, and south through Hungary; and empties into the Danube 26 miles north by west of Belgrad. Its principal tributaries are the Hernad on the right, and the Szamos, Körös, Maros, and Berga on the left. The chief towns on its banks are Szigeth, Tokay, Szolnok, Csóngrád, and Szegedin. Length, estimated, about 700 miles; navigable for steamboats from Tokay.

Themis (thē'mis). [L., from Gr. Θέμις.] 1. A Greek goddess, the personification of law, order, and abstract right.—2. An asteroid (No. 24) discovered by De Gasparis at Naples, April 5, 1853.

Themistocles (thē-mis'tō-klēz). [Gr. Θεμιστοκλῆς.] Born in the latter part of the 6th century B. C.; died about 460 (perhaps as late as 447). A famous Athenian statesman and commander. He became a political leader in opposition to Aristides, who was ostracized in 483; was instrumental in increasing the naval resources of Athens; induced the Athenians to leave Athens for Salamis and the fleet, and brought about the victory of Salamis in 480; urged the fortifications of Athens and of the Piræus, and the development of the naval power of Athens; and was ostracized about 470. He was charged with complicity in the treason of Pausanias. He lived in exile in Argos, Coreyra, Epirus, and elsewhere, and went to Persia in 465, when he was pensioned by Artaxerxes, and established himself at Magnesia.

Even after Leonidas had so gallantly perished, Themistocles had great difficulty in persuading them not to take flight in their ships; if once they went to sea, he said, all was lost. And then his reply to Eurýbiades, which has been by some censured, appears to me to have been one of the grandest ever made by man. Eurýbiades, in the heat of dispute, shook his staff in a menacing manner at him. "Strike, but hear," was the only return he made. To have drawn forth the sword by his side, and to have smote him dead for such an insult, would have been no more than natural; but any one could have done that. A poor drayman in a pothouse might have done it; but to forbear, to waive his own redress in order to extinguish resentments, and keep the troops united for his country's sake, this appears to me truly great!

Carlyle, Lects. on the Hist. of Lit., p. 31.

Thénard (tā-nār'), Louis Jacques. Born at Louptière, near Nogent-sur-Seine, France, May 4, 1777; died at Paris, June 21, 1857. A French chemist, professor in the Collège de France; baron and peer of France. He discovered Thénard's blue, etc. He wrote "Traité élémentaire de chimie" (1813). He worked in connection with Gay-Lussac.

Theobald (thē'ō-bald). Died 1161. An English prelate, archbishop of Canterbury 1139-61.

Theobald, Lewis. Born at Sittingbourne, Kent, England; died 1774. An English playwright, translator, Shaksperian commentator, and historical writer. He published "Shakspeare Restored," abusing Pope (1726), and edited Shakspeare (1733). He was the original hero of Pope's "Dunciad," as a revenge for "Shakspeare Restored."

Theocritus (thē-ok'ri-tus). [Gr. Θεόκριτος.] Born at Syracuse; lived in the 3d century B. C. A famous Greek idyllic poet. He lived in Syracuse, Cos, and Alexandria. His idyls represent the life of herdsmen, shepherds, and fishermen.

Theocritus, a Syracusan, flourished about 270 B. C., under Ptolemy II. (Philadelphus), and is the Greek representative of pastoral or bucolic poetry. Shepherds contending for a prize in alternate or amœbæic strains give rise to this rustic poetry, which was distinctively Doric and especially Sicilian; hence Milton calls his "Lycidas," in which one shepherd is supposed to be mourning for another, a Doric lay, and invokes the Sicilian muse. Besides some epigrams and fragments, we have 31 short poems under the name of Theocritus,—though the genuineness of some is doubtful,—mainly in the Doric dialect. Scarcely one half of these are properly pastoral in subject; but most of them may properly be called idyls, i. e. little pictures of life. Jebb, Greek Lit., p. 141.

Theodelinde (thē-od'e-lind; G. pron. tã-ō-de-lin'de). Lived about 590. A Bavarian princess and Lombard queen, daughter of Garibald I., and wife of Authari and later of Ago.

Theodoric. See Theodorice.

Theodora (thē-ō-dō'rā). [Gr. Θεοδώρα, gift of God.] Born at Constantinople, in Cyprus; died 547 or 548. An actress and courtesan (according to the usual account) who married Justinian about 523, and became Byzantine empress in 527. She took an important part in the administration of the affairs of the empire.

Theodora, surnamed "The Elder." Lived about the beginning of the 10th century. A Roman woman influential in Italy and in papal affairs; mother of Marozia.

Theodora, "The Younger." Lived in the 10th century. Daughter of Theodora the Elder; influential at Rome.

Theodore (thē'ō-dōr) I. [L. Theodorus, from Gr. Θεόδωρος, gift of God; F. Théodore, It. Teodoro, G. Theodor, Russ. Feodor.] Pope 642-649, an opponent of the Monothelites.

Theodore II. Pope 898.

Theodore I. (Lascaris). Died 1222. Son-in-law of Alexius III. Angelus. He was raised to the throne of Nicea April 13, 1204, on the storming of Constantinople by the Venetians and Crusaders.

Theodore II. (originally Kasa or Kassa). Born about 1818; committed suicide at Magdala, April 13, 1868. King of Abyssinia. He is said to have been educated for a priest, but became a partizan leader. Repeated successes resulted in the conquest of Tigre and the proclamation of Theodore as king in 1855. He also conquered Shoa and waged war with the Gallas. At first a reformer, he became at last a cruel despot. His imprisonment of the British consul Cameron and other Europeans brought about the intervention of the English. Abyssinia was invaded by British troops under Napier in 1868, and Magdala was stormed April 13, 1868.

Theodore I., King of Corsica. See Neuhof.

Theodore of Tarsus. Died 690. An English prelate, of Greek origin; archbishop of Canterbury 668-690.

Theodoret (thē-od'ō-ret), L. Theodoretus (thē-od'ō-rē-tus). Born at Antioch about 390; died about 457. A Greek theologian, church historian, and exegete; a member of the school of Antioch. He became bishop of Cyrus or Cyrhus (near the Euphrates) about 423; was deposed about 448; and was restored by the Council of Chalcedon in 451. He wrote commentaries, controversial works, a continuation of the history of Eusebius, lives of ascetics, letters, etc.

Theodoric (thē-od'ō-rik), "The Great." [LL. Theodoricus, LGr. Θεοδωρικῆς, accom. form of a Gothic name cognate with OHG. Diotrich, Diotrich, MHG. Dietrich, G. Dietrich, ruler of the people.] Born in Pannonia about 454; died Aug. 30, 526. A celebrated king of the East

Goths, son of the Amaling prince Theodemer. He passed his boyhood as a hostage at Constantinople; with his father invaded Moesia in 473; and succeeded his father about 474. He started on the invasion of Italy late in 483; repeatedly defeated the Gepidae; and defeated Odoacer at the Isonzo Aug. 28, 489, at Verona Sept. 30, and on the Adda Aug. 11, 490. On Feb. 27, 493, a peace was concluded according to which the two kings were to live together in Italy, Odoacer as the military subordinate of Theodoric. But in March Odoacer was slain by Theodoric at a banquet, and the latter became the sole ruler in Italy and the founder of the East-Gothic power there. He introduced many reforms. He put to death Boethius and Symmachus. In medieval German romance he is celebrated as Dietrich von Bern. Also spelled Theodoric.

It is no wonder that Theodoric became the subject of many fabulous stories, and that tradition represented his reign as having been almost a kingdom of heaven upon earth. Even before the sixth century closed, men told in Italy nearly the same story that was told in England respecting the days of Alfred—how the great king had made righteousness prevail in his realm so that gold pieces could be left exposed on the highway for a year and a day without being stolen. Many of his sayings were quoted as proverbs in the land, and anecdotes were related to show how, like Solomon in the matter of the two mothers and their infants, Theodoric had displayed in the judgment seat his wonderful insight into human nature. But it was not in Italy or amongst the Goths that his legendary fame reached its highest point. The whole Teutonic race regarded his glory as their own, and his imagined deeds were the theme of popular songs in all the German lands. The story of "Dietrich of Bern" (the High German way of pronouncing "Theodoric of Verona") is indeed, as told in the poems, very different from the history of the real Theodoric. He is described as the vassal of Attila and the foe of Ermanaric, who is partly confounded with Odoacer; and in some of the songs "Dietrich" is even represented as vanquished, and as a fugitive or a captive. But amid all this strange distortion of the history, the character of the legendary Dietrich is essentially that of the Gothic king.

Bradley, Story of the Goths, p. 171.

Theodorus. See Theodore.

Theodosia (thē-ō-dō'shi-ä). [Gr. Θεοδοσία, gift of God.] See Feodosia.

Theodosian Code (thē-ō-dō'shi-an kōd). A collection of Roman laws from the time of Constantine to that of Theodosius II., comprised in 16 books, first published A. D. 438.

Theodosius (thē-ō-dō'shi-us). Executed at Carthage 376 A. D. A Roman general, distinguished for his services in Britain, on the Danube, and in Africa.

Theodosius I. "The Great." Born at Canca, in northern Spain, about 346; died at Milan, Jan. 17, 395. Roman emperor, son of Flavius Theodosius, a general (chiefly noted for his campaigns in Britain) of Valentinian I. He commanded in Mesia in 374; was made joint emperor by Gratian and ruler over the East in 379; defeated the Goths and other invaders; and after 382 enrolled the Goths in the empire. After the death of Gratian in 383, he had as colleagues Maximus, Valentinian II., and Eugenius. He defeated Arbogast and Eugenius at the Frigidus near Aquileia in 394, and became sole emperor. In ecclesiastical history he is noted for his submission to Ambrose.

Theodosius II. Born 401; died 450. Emperor of the East, son of Arcadius whom he succeeded in 408. He was controlled largely by his sister Pulcheria and his wife Eudocia. He carried on war with Persia. During his reign the empire was invaded by the Huns. The Theodosian Code was formed by his order.

Theodosius III. Byzantine emperor 716-717.

Theodosius, Obelisk of. See Obelisk of Theodosius.

Théodule (tä-ō-dül') Pass, or Matterjoch (mät'ter-yōch). A pass over the Alps, leading from Zermatt in Switzerland to Val Tournanche in Italy. Height, 10,900 feet.

Theognis (thē-og'nis). [Gr. Θεόγνις.] Born in Megara; lived in the middle or last part of the 6th century B. C. A celebrated Greek elegiac poet.

Theognis (540 B. C.), a Dorian noble of Megara, has left us about 1,400 elegiac verses in the Ionic dialect—much more than we have from any early Greek elegist—in which he seeks to impress the orthodox doctrines of the Dorian aristocracy on a young Megarian noble named Cyrnus, and puts in many quaint bits of worldly wisdom by the way. His tone, and the respectability of his views, made him a standard author in Attic schools, and his text has been much confused by additions. Jebb, Greek Lit., p. 54.

Theogony (thē-og'ō-ni), The. [Gr. Θεογονία, the origin of the gods.] An ancient Greek poem of 1,022 lines, attributed to Hesiod, treating of the origin of the order of nature from chaos and the origin of the gods. It was a standard work on theology among the Greeks.

Theon (thē'on). [Gr. Θεών.] Lived in the latter half of the 4th century A. D. An Alexandrian mathematician and astronomer, father of Hypatia. He wrote a commentary on the "Almagest."

Theophilus (thē-ō-f'i-lus). [L., from Gr. Θεόφιλος, one who loves God; F. Théophile, It. Sp. Teofilo, Pg. Theophilo, G. Theophilus (Gottlieb).] In legend, the administrator of a bishopric in Adana, Asia Minor, said to have made a compact with the devil.

Theophrastus (thē-ō-fras'tus). [L., from Gr. Θεόφραστος.] Born at Eresus, Lesbos, about 372 B. C.; died 288 or 287 B. C. A Greek philosopher, a disciple of Aristotle whom he succeeded as head of the Peripatetic school. He wrote on the "History of Plants," etc.

Theophrastus of Eresus in Lesbos (374-287 B. C.) succeeded Aristotle at the head of the Lyceum, and followed his master in handling physical as well as moral science. We have from him two botanical works, "Researches about Plants," in nine books, and "Principles of Vegetable Life," in six books, which show him to have been a thorough and acute inquirer; also 30 short, lively sketches of character—such as "The Flatterer," "The Grumbler," "The Boastful Man," "The Man of Petty Ambition." These characters were the original models of those sketches which English literature produced in the 17th century, such as Hall's "Characteristics of Virtues and Vices," Overbury's "Characters or Witty Descriptions of the Properties of Sundry Persons," and Earle's "Microcosmographic."

Jebb, Greek Lit., p. 135.

Theophrastus Such (thē-ō-fras'tus such), The Impressions of. A series of essays by George Eliot, published in 1879.

Theopompus (thē-ō-pom'pus). [Gr. Θεόπομπος, sent of God.] Born in Chios about 378 B. C.; died about the end of the 4th century B. C. A Greek historian and rhetorician, the aristocratic and pro-Macedonian leader in Chios. His chief works are "Hellenics" and "Philipics" (fragments edited by Müller).

Theotocos (thē-ōf'ō-kos). [From LGr. θεοτόκος, bearing God, mother of God.] The mother of God; a title of the Virgin Mary. Also Theotokos.

Theramenes (the-ram'e-nēz). [Gr. Θεραιμένης.] Executed 404 B. C. An Athenian politician and commander. He was one of the leaders in the establishment of the oligarchic rule of the 400, which he later opposed; served at Cyzicus, Arginusæ, and elsewhere; was instrumental in procuring the condemnation of the Athenian generals after Arginusæ; was one of the negotiators for peace with Sparta; became one of the thirty tyrants; and was put to death through the influence of Critias.

Theresa, or Teresa (te-rē'sā or tā-rā'sā), Saint. [It. Sp. Teresa, Pg. Theresa, G. Therese, F. Thérèse.] Born at Avila, Spain, March 28, 1515; died at Alba de Liste, Spain, 1582. A Spanish saint and author. She entered the Carmelite order in 1534; established a reformed order of Carmelites in 1562; and became famous for her mystic visions. Her works, including "El camino de la perfeccion" ("Way of Perfection") and "El castillo interior" ("Castle of the Soul"), were published in 1587.

Theresa Christina Maria. Born at Naples, March 14, 1822; died at Oporto, Portugal, Dec. 28, 1889. Empress of Brazil. See Pedro II.

Theresienstadt (ter-ā'zē-en-stāt), or Theresiopol (ter-ā'zē-ō-pel), or Maria-Theresiopol (mā-rē'ū-ter-ā'zē-ō-pel), Hung. Szabadka (so'bad-ko). A royal free city in the county of Bács, Hungary, situated 24 miles west-southwest of Szegedin. It is an agricultural center. Population (1890), 72,683.

Theresienstadt, Slav. Terezín (tā-rā-zēn'). A town in Bohemia, situated on the Eger, near its junction with the Elbe, 32 miles north-northwest of Prague. It is the principal fortified place in Bohemia. Population (1890), 7,215.

Thermaic Gulf (thēr-mā'ik gulf). [L. Thermaicus Sinus.] The ancient name of the Gulf of Saloniki.

Thermidor (thēr-mi-dōr'; F. pron. ter-mē-dōr'). [F., from Gr. θερμη, heat, and δῶρον, a gift.] The name adopted in 1793 by the National Convention of the first French republic for the eleventh month of the year. It consisted of 30 days, beginning in the years 1 to 7 with July 19, and in 8 to 13 with July 20.

Thermidorians (thēr-mi-dō'ri-anz). The more moderate party in the French Revolution, who took part in or sympathized with the overthrow of Robespierre and his adherents on the 9th Thermidor, year 2 (July 27, 1794).

Thermopylæ (thēr-mop'y-lē). [Gr. Θερμοπύλαι, gate of the hot springs.] In ancient geography, a narrow pass from Thessaly to Lœris, between Mount Ceta and a marsh bordering the Maliae Gulf. The configuration of the land has been somewhat changed in recent times. Through it passed the only road from northern to southern Greece. Here, in 480 B. C., occurred one of the most famous conflicts of the Persian wars. A small army of Greeks under Leonidas defended the pass against a vast army under Xerxes. Their position was betrayed, and Leonidas sent away his troops, except 300 Spartans and 700 Thebians, who remained and were slain. Here, too, in 279 or 278 B. C., the allied Greeks attempted unsuccessfully to prevent the passage of the Gauls under Brennus; and here, in 191 B. C., the Romans under Glabrio defeated Antiochus the Great of Syria.

The springs at Thermopylæ are hot (about 100° Fahr.) and salt. There are two of them, which seem anciently to have been devoted respectively to male and female bathers (Pausan.). They are enclosed within receptacle of masonry, about two feet in depth, from which in cool weather a strong vapour rises. The name "Cauldron" is thus very expressive. Raucklinson, Herod., IV. 145.

Théroigne de Méricourt (tā-rwāny' dē mā-rē-kōr'). Anne Joseph Terwagne, called. Born at Mareourt, Luxembourg, Aug. 13, 1762; died at Paris, June 9, 1817. A heroïne of the French Revolution, an adherent of the Girondist party; called the "Amazon of the Revolution," the "Pelle Liégeoise," the "Fury of the Gironde," etc. She played a prominent part in the taking of the Bastille, the expedition of the women to Versailles in Oct., 1789, the events of Aug. 10, 1792, etc. She was insane in her later years.

Theron (thē'ron). [Gr. Θήρων.] Tyrant of Agrigentum in Sicily 488-472 B. C. He ruled also over Himera.

Thersites (thēr-sī'tēz). [Gr. Θερσίτης.] In Greek legend, the most hateful and impudent of the Greeks assembled before Troy. Shakspeare introduces him in "Troilus and Cressida."

Thervings (thēr'vingz). See the extract.

About the year 200, when they were living on the north shore of the Black Sea, the Gutsans or Goths divided themselves into two great branches, the Thervings and the Greutungs. These two peoples had also other names which are much better known in history. The Thervings were called Visigoths (i. e., West Goths), and the Greutungs Ostrogoths (East Goths). These latter names referred at first to the situation which the two divisions then occupied, one east, the other west of the river Dniester; but by a curious coincidence they continued to be appropriate down to the latest days of Gothic history, for when the Goths conquered the south of Europe, the Visigoths went westwards to Gaul and Spain, while the Ostrogoths settled in Italy.

Bradley, Story of the Goths, pp. 5-7.

Theseum (thē-sē'um). [Gr. Θησεῖον.] A temple at Athens, probably a temple of Hephaestus (Vulcan). It is one of the three most perfect surviving Greek temples. It is a Doric peripteros of Pentelic marble, of 6 by 13 columns, on a stylobate of 3 steps, measuring 45½ by 104 feet. The columns are 19 feet high and 3 feet 5 inches in base diameter. The cella has 2 columns in antis in both pronaos and opisthodomos. The metopes of the eastern frieze and those nearest on the flanks are sculptured from the myths of Hercules and Theseus; the pediments were filled with sculptures, now lost. Over the ante and columns of both ends of the cella there is a sculptured frieze; that on the east represents a combat between Athenians and Thracians; that on the west, a fight with centaurs.

Theseus (thē'sūs or thē'sē-us). [Gr. Θησεύς.] In Greek legend, the chief hero of Attica; son of Ægeus, king of Athens, and Æthra, daughter of Pittheus, king of Troezen. He was brought up at Troezen, and when he reached maturity set out for Athens, which he reached after wonderful adventures, and where he was recognized and acknowledged by Ægeus. He captured the Marathonian bull, and when the Athenians sent their tribute of youths and maidens to Minos, he went with them and slew the Minotaur with the help of Ariadne, daughter of Minos, who fell in love with him. She gave him a sword and a clue of thread by means of which he found his way through the labyrinth. He sailed away with Ariadne, but abandoned her on the island of Naxos. He also fought with the Amazons, who in turn invaded Attica; was one of the Argonauts; took part in the Caledonian hunt; and performed other marvelous exploits. He was slain in Scyros by Lycomedes.

Theseus. The Duke of Athens, a character in Shakspeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

The days of the Frank duchy of Athens have almost passed away from memory. But from the memory of English-speaking men at least they should not pass away. It was from the French and Italian holders of that duchy that Shakspeare borrowed that title which, to purely classical ears, seems so strange, when Theseus himself, the legendary statesman who wrought the union of the Attic towns, was brought on the stage, like a De la Roche or an Acciaiuoli, as Theseus, Duke of Athens. And doubtless many readers of English and French history have been puzzled when, in the story of the fight of Creçy, a Duke of Athens appears as if he were as naturally to be looked for at such a moment as the Count of Alençon or the Earl of Warwick. Freeman, Hist. Essays, III. 295.

Thesiger (thes'i-jēr), Frederic Augustus, Baron Chelmsford. Born May 31, 1827. An English general. He served as aide-de-camp to Major-General Markham in the Crimean campaign, and as a lieutenant-general in the Abyssinian campaign of 1868; was adjutant-general of the forces in India 1869-74; became major-general in 1877; and had chief command of the British troops in the Zulu war of 1879 until relieved by Sir Garnet Wolseley. He gained a decisive victory over the Zulus under Cetshwayo at Ulundi July 4, 1879.

Thespiæ (thes'pi-ē). [Gr. Θέσπια, Θέσπια.] In ancient geography, a city in Bœotia, Greece, 8 miles west by south of Thebes. The city is mentioned by Homer (Catalogue). With Plataea it refused to give earth and water to the heralds of Xerxes; and it sent to Thermopylæ 700 men who remained and perished with the Spartans. The Thespians fought at Plataea in 479, and against Athens at Delium in 424. The walls of the city were later destroyed by Thebes. Thespiæ was noted for the worship of Eros and the Muses.

Thespians Maids. The Muses. See Thespiæ.

Thespis (thes'pis). [Gr. Θέσπις.] Lived in the middle of the 6th century B. C. An Attic poet, the reputed founder of tragedy. He is said to have introduced monologues and perhaps dialogues into the dithyrambic choruses.

Thesprotia (thes-prō'ti-ä), or Thesprotis (thes-prō'tis). In ancient geography, a region in southwestern Epirus, lying near the sea.

Thessalonians (thes-a-lō-ni-anz), Epistle to the. The title of two of the Pauline epistles in the New Testament. The main theme of both epistles is the second coming of Christ.

Thessalonica (thes'a-lō-ni-kä). [Gr. Θεσσαλονίκη.] The ancient name of Saloniki.

Thessaly (thes'a-li). [L. Thessalia, from Gr. Θεσσαλία.] A district which in ancient times formed the northeastern division of Greece. It was bounded by Macedonia on the north (separated by the Cambanian Mountains and Mount Olympus), the Thracian Sea and Magnesia (or including Magnesia) on the east, Doris and Ætolia on the south, and Epirus on the west (separated by Mount Pindus). Thessaly contains the mountains Ossa, Pelion, and Othrys, and is traversed by the Peneius. Its chief divisions were Perrhæbia, Pelasgiotis, Thessaliotis, Hestieotis, Magnesia, and Phthiotis. Many of its cities, mountains, and valleys were celebrated in Greek legend. It was aristocratic and pro-Persian in its tendencies. The greater part of it was ceded by Turkey to Greece in 1851. The present inhabitants are Greeks, with some Turks and Rumanians.

Thibaudeau (tē-bō-dō'), Comte Antoine Claire de. Born at Poitiers, France, March 23, 1765; died at Paris, March 1, 1854. A French politician and historian. He became deputy to the Convention in 1793, and a member of the Mountain; became president of the Council of Five Hundred in Feb., 1796; was embroiled by Napoleon I.; lived in exile under the Bourbons; and was made senator by Napoleon III.

Among his works are "Mémoires sur la Convention et le Directoire" (1824), "Mémoires sur le Consulat" (1826), "Histoire générale de Napoléon Bonaparte" (1827-28), etc.

Thibaut (tē-bō') IV., Count of Champagne and King of Navarre. Born 1201; died 1253. A French ruler, noted as a poet.

Thibaut de Champagne, King of Navarre, . . . is indeed the most important single figure of early French lyrical poetry. . . . Thibaut's poems have been more than once reprinted, the last edition being that of M. Tarbé. This contains eighty-one pieces, not a few of which, however, are probably the work of others. The majority of them are Chansons d'Amour. Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 63.

Thibet. See Thibet.

Thierry, or Thierry (ti-er'i; F. pron. tyā-rē'), I., or Theodoric (thē-od'ō-rik). Died 534. King of Austrasia; son of Clovis, and one of his successors in 511.

Thierry II. Died 613. King of Burgundy and later of Austrasia, second son of Childebert II.

Thierry III. Died 691 (692?). King of the Franks, a younger son of Clovis II.

Thierry IV. Died 737. King of the Franks, one of the "rois fainéants." The government was administered by Charles Martel. See Charles.

Thierry (tyā-rē'), Amédée Simon Dominique. Born at Blois, France, Aug. 2, 1797; died at Paris, March 26, 1873. A French historian and politician, brother of J. N. A. Thierry. He was for a time professor at Besançon; after the revolution of 1830 was prefect of the upper Saône; and later held other political offices. He was made a senator in 1860. He wrote "Histoire des Gaulois" (1828), "Histoire de la Gaule sous l'administration romaine" (1840-47), "Histoire d'Attila" (1856), "Tableau de l'empire romain" (1862), "Récits de l'histoire romaine" (1860, 1864), "Saint-Jérôme" (1867), etc.

Thierry, Jacques Nicolas Augustin. Born at Blois, May 10, 1795; died at Paris, May 22, 1856. An eminent French historian. He obtained a free scholarship at the college of his native town, and graduated with the highest honors. Then he took a two years' course of study at the Ecole Normale in Paris (1811-13), and fitted himself for a teacher. After a brief stay in a provincial college, he returned to Paris to follow up literature as a means of livelihood. For a while he worked in collaboration with the philosopher Saint-simon, and published with him 3 books (1814-17). Then he contributed several original papers to various periodical publications. These papers he subsequently fused together, and composed in this way his "Histoire de la conquête de l'Angleterre par les Normands" (1825) and his "Lettres sur l'histoire de France" (1827). In 1826 he became completely broken down in health, and was left blind and paralyzed. The remainder of his literary work was done through the medium of secretaries. With their help he published his "Dix ans d'études historiques" (1834), his "Récits des temps mérovingiens" (1840), and an "Essai sur l'histoire de la formation et des progrès du tiers-état" (1853).

Thierry and Theodoret. A play by Fletcher, Massinger, and another, published in 1621 (written a few years earlier).

Thiers (tyār). A town in the department of Puy-de-Dôme, France, situated on the Durolle 24 miles east-northeast of Clermont-Ferrand. Cutlery is made here and in the vicinity. Population (1891), commune, 16,814.

Thiers, Louis Adolphe. Born at Marseilles, April 15, 1797; died at St.-Germain-en-Laye, near Paris, Sept. 3, 1877. A distinguished French statesman and historian. He studied law at Aix, and in 1821 went to Paris, where he became a journalist. His "Histoire de la révolution française" appeared 1823-27. In 1830 he established with Mignet and Armand Carrel the "National," which contributed greatly to the downfall of the Bourbons. He was a prominent supporter of Louis Philippe, and held various cabinet positions 1832-36 (premier Feb.-Aug., 1836). In March, 1840, he again became premier; resigned in Oct. His principal work, "Histoire du consulat et de l'empire," was published 1845-62. He was a conspicuous member of the Constituent and Legislative assemblies 1848-51, and was arrested by Napoleon III. at the time of the coup d'état in 1851. In 1863 he was elected to the Corps Législatif, where he led the opposition to the imperial régime. He protested against the declaration of war in 1870, on the ground that France was not ready. He conducted the negotiations for an armistice with Germany, was elected to the National Assembly, and was chosen chief of the executive power Feb. 17, 1871. He negotiated the peace with Germany, suppressed the insurrection of the Commune, and by his extraordinary energy and admirable financing freed his country of foreign occupation before the stipulated time. On Aug. 31, 1871, he was declared by the Assembly president of the republic for a term of three years, and resigned May 24, 1873. He was a member of the Academy from 1834.

Thing (ting). [Not from AS. thing, a council, but repr. Icel. thing, an assembly, conference, = Sw. Dan. ting, a court, a place of assembly, a legal trial.] In Scandinavian countries and in regions largely settled by Scandinavians (as the east and north of England), an assembly, public meeting, parliament, or court of law. Also Ting.

Thirteen Communes. See Tredici Comuni.

Thirty, Battle of the. A fight between thirty Bretons and thirty Englishmen, pitted by Jean de Beaumanoir and Bemborough, an Englishman, against each other, to decide a contest. The fight is said to have taken place between the castles of Josselin and Floermel in France in 1351. The English were beaten.

Thirty Tyrants, The. 1. An aristocratic body which usurped the government of Athens 404-403 B. C. The most notable was Critias. They were expelled by the democratic party under the lead of Thrasybulus.—2. A popular name given collectively to the body of pretenders to the Roman Empire under the reigns of Valerian, Gallienus, etc. Among them were Tetricus and Odenathus.

Thirty Years' War, The. A religious and political war in central Europe which involved Germany and various countries. It was caused by the friction between the Protestants and Catholics in the Empire; and the immediate occasion was the infringement by the court of Austria of the rights of the Bohemian Protestants, who in May, 1618, rose in revolt under the lead of Count Thurn. The following were the main events: In 1619 the emperor Matthias died, and was succeeded in the Hapsburg dominions and as emperor by Ferdinand II., but Frederick V., elector of the Palatinate, was chosen as a rival king by the Bohemians; in Nov., 1620, the Catholic League defeated Frederick at the White Mountain; in 1622 Tilly and the Catholic League were victorious at Wimpfen and Höchst; in 1625 Christian IV. of Denmark became the leader of the Protestants; in 1626 Tilly defeated Christian IV. at Lutter, and Wallenstein, the Imperialist general, defeated Mansfeld at Dessau; in 1629 the Edict of Restitution was issued by Ferdinand II. (see Restitution); in 1630 Wallenstein was dismissed, while Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden became the Protestant leader. The events of 1631 were the storming of Magdeburg by Tilly and the victory of Gustavus at Breitenfeld; of 1632, the successes of Gustavus, the reentry of Wallenstein to the Imperialist service, and the victory and death of Gustavus at Lutzen (Nov. 16); of 1634, the murder of Wallenstein, and the Imperialist victory at Nordlingen; of 1635, the treaty of Prague between Saxony and Ferdinand II., and the interference of France on the Protestant side under the lead of Richelieu; of 1636, the victory of the Swedes at Wittstock; of 1637, the accession of the emperor Ferdinand III.; of 1642, the victory of the Swedes at Breitenfeld; and of 1643, 1644, and 1645, generally French and Swedish victories under Condé, Turenne, and Torstenson. In 1648 the war was terminated by the treaty of Westphalia (which see). In general the Protestants were strong in northern Germany, the Catholics in southern Germany. Spain was the chief ally of the emperor; France, Sweden, and Denmark were the principal allies of the Protestants. The main profits of the war fell to France and Sweden. Germany suffered severely in loss of life, property, and morale.

This (this). In ancient geography, a city in Upper Egypt, near Abydos or perhaps identical with it.

Thisbe (thiz'bē). [Gr. Θισβη.] In classical legend, a maiden of Babylon, beloved by Pyramus. Living in adjoining houses, they were able to converse through a hole in the wall without the knowledge of their parents, who opposed their marriage. A rendezvous was appointed at the tomb of Ninus. Thisbe, who appeared first, was frightened by a lion, and, running away, dropped her mantle which the beast soiled with blood. Pyramus, seeing the blood, and believing that Thisbe had been slain, killed himself under a mulberry-tree, the fruit of which was ever after blood-red. Shakspeare introduced the story in the farcical interlude in the "Midsummer Night's Dream."

Thistle (this'l). A steel yacht (cutter), designed by George L. Watson, and launched at Glasgow April 21, 1887. Her principal dimensions were: length over all, 108.05 feet; length at water-line, 86.46; beam, 20.03; draught, 13.80; displacement, about 138 tons. She was designed expressly to capture the America's cup, but lost the cup races to Volunteer. She was afterward sold to the Emperor of Germany and rechristened Meteor.

A German Protestant theologian and preacher, professor of theology at Halle from 1826. He was educated at Breslau and at Berlin, where he was appointed professor (extraordinary) in 1823. His works include "Die Lehre vom Sünden und Versöhner" ("The Doctrine of the Sinner and Redemption"), "Stundener Andacht" ("Hours of Devotion," 1840), commentaries on Romans, John, the Sermon on the Mount, Hebrews, and Psalms, an answer to Strauss's "Leben Jesu" ("Glaubwürdigkeit der evangelischen Geschichte," 1837), "Vorschichte des Rationalismus" (1853-1862), "Geschichte des Rationalismus" (1865), etc.

Thomas (tom'as). Saint, or Didymus. [Heb., 'a twin'; Gr. Θωμάς; L. Didymus, from Gr. ὁ δίδυμος, a twin; It. Tommaso, Sp. Tomas, Pg. Thomas or Thomaz.] One of the twelve apostles; according to tradition, an evangelist in Parthia and India, where he suffered martyrdom.

Thomas of Ercehdoune. See Thomas the Rhymer.

Thomas of London. Born at London, 1118; murdered in Canterbury cathedral, Dec. 29, 1170. An English prelate, archbishop of Canterbury.

He was the son of a rich merchant, and his career was advanced by Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, in whose household he was about 1142. He became archdeacon of Canterbury in 1154, and chancellor of Henry II. in 1155, an office he filled with great magnificence; and, though only in deacon's orders, was suddenly appointed archbishop of Canterbury in 1162. He became a strong advocate of the church's rights, defending her against the king whose partizan he had previously been. He refused to consent to the constitutions of the Council of Clarendon, curtailing clerical privileges, but was prevailed upon to do so by the Pope. He was tried by Henry for breach of allegiance in endeavoring to leave the country after this, and his property was confiscated and his ecclesiastical revenue sequestered. He finally escaped to France, and thence to Rome, where the Pope reinstated him in his see. After much correspondence and many threats of excommunication against the English bishops, he was reconciled with Henry in 1170, and returned to England; but his temper was as haughty as ever, and Henry prayed "to be rid of this turbulent priest." Four knights, overhearing this hasty exclamation, slew Becket before the altar of St. Benedict in the north transept of Canterbury cathedral, Dec. 29, 1170. In 1172 he was canonized, and in 1220 his bones were removed to Trinity Chapel, where they were for several centuries the object of pilgrimages. Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales" were told on a pilgrimage to his shrine. Henry VIII. destroyed it, and burned and scattered his bones. Also Thomas Becket or a Becket.

Thomas of Woodstock, Duke of Gloucester. Born at Woodstock, England, Jan. 7, 1355; murdered at Calais, France, Sept. 8, 1397. The youngest son of Edward III., a leading politician in the reign of Richard II.

Thomas the Rhymer, or Thomas of Ercehdoune (now Earlston). Lived about 1225-1300. A Scottish poet, noted in folk-lore and Arthurian legend as a prophet and a guide to the mysterious halls beneath the Eildon Hills. According to the popular story, the Queen of Faery came to him as he sat under the Eildon tree, and carried him to Fairyland, where they lived in happiness for three years, at the end of which time she brought him back to the Eldon tree and told him of many things that were to happen in the wars between England and Scotland. He was called "True Thomas" from the truth of these prophecies. He finally disappeared in a forest, following a hart and hind, and was seen no more. (Compare Tannhäuser.) "The Romance and Prophecies of Thomas of Erceoloune" has been edited by Dr. Murray for the Early English Text Society (1875). Sir Walter Scott attributed to him the poem "Sir Tristrem," a 13th-century romance, which he edited from the Auchinleck MS. in 1804; but it is not now thought to be his. "Sir Tristrem" was edited by McNeill in 1856 for the Scottish Text Society.

The charter [dated 1299, in which his son describes himself as the heir of Thomas Rymour de Erceclon] quoted in the "Minstrelsy" contains written evidence that the epithet of Rymour was peculiar to our Thomas, and was dropped by his son, who designates himself simply Thomas of Ercecloune, son of Thomas the Rymour of Ercecloune; which I think is conclusive upon the subject. In all this discussion, I have scorned to avail myself of the tradition of the country, as well as the suspicious testimony of Boece, Dempster, &c., grounded probably upon that tradition, which uniformly affirms the name of Thomas to have been Learmont or Leirmont, and that of the Rhymer a personal epithet. . . . Certain it is that his castle is called Leirmont's Tower, and that he is as well known to the country people by that name as by the appellation of the Rhymer. Letter from Scott to George Ellis, in Lockhart, I, 217.

He was appointed colonel in May, 1861, and served under Patterson; was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers and transferred to the Department of the Cumberland in Aug., 1861; gained the victory of Mill Springs Jan. 19, 1862; was distinguished at Perryville Oct. 8, and as commander of the center at Murfreesboro; and became famous for his defense of the Union position in the battle of Chickamauga Sept. 19-20, 1863 (hence called "the Rock of Chickamauga"). On Oct. 19, 1863, he was made commander of the Army of the Cumberland, with the rank of brigadier-general; and fought at the battle of Chattanooga, and with Sherman in the invasion of Georgia in 1864. He was sent to Tennessee to repel Hood's invasion in Sept., 1864, and defeated Hood at Nashville Dec. 15-16, 1864. He was promoted major-general in the regular army and organized cavalry operations (capture of Davis, etc.) in 1865. He was commander of military divisions and departments in Tennessee, etc., and lastly of the military division of the Pacific 1869-70.

Thomas, Joseph. Born in Cayuga County, N. Y., Sept. 23, 1811; died Dec. 24, 1891. An American author. He was educated as a physician, and was for a time professor of Latin and Greek in Haverford College. He was associated with Baldwin in compiling the "Pronouncing Gazetteer" (1845); edited the biographical and geographical vocabularies to Webster's dictionaries; collaborated with Baldwin in the compilation of "A New and Complete Gazetteer of the United States" and of "Lippincott's Pronouncing Gazetteer of the World" (1855); and edited "A Comprehensive Medical Dictionary" (1864; revised 1866) and Lippincott's "Pronouncing Dictionary of Biography and Mythology" (1870-71). He wrote also "Travels in Egypt and Palestine" (1853), etc.

Thomas, Lorenzo. Born at Newcastle, Del., Oct. 26, 1804; died at Washington, D. C., March 2, 1875. An American general. He served in the Seminole war; was chief of staff to Butler in the Mexican war, and later chief of staff to Scott; was adjutant-general in the Civil War; and was appointed by Johnson secretary of war ad interim 1868 (but did not serve).

Thomas, Theodore. Born at Esens, Hannover, Oct. 11, 1835. An American musical conductor. He made his first appearance in public about 1841 as a violinist. He was brought to the United States in 1845, and was first and solo violin in concerts and opera till 1861. From 1855 to 1869 he gave a series of concerts of chamber-music; and his symphony concerts in New York, begun in 1864, were given every season (except from 1869 to 1872) until 1878, when he became director of the College of Music at Cincinnati, Ohio. He returned to New York in 1880, and made it the headquarters of his orchestra till 1891, when he removed to Chicago. He has been mainly instrumental in developing the musical taste of the country by his series of orchestral concerts, as well as by his work as conductor of the New York Chorus Society, the Cincinnati Societies, of the New York Chorus Society, the Cincinnati Societies, etc. He was made musical director of the World's Columbian Exposition at Chicago, and resigned in 1893.

Thomas a Kempis (kem'pis); properly Thomas Hammerken or Hamerken. Born at Kempen, Rhenish Prussia, about 1380; died near Zwolle, Netherlands, July 25, 1471. A German mystic and ascetic writer, generally regarded as the author of "De imitatione Christi" ("Imitation of Christ," 1486) (which see). He entered the Augustinian convent Agnetenberg, near Zwolle, in 1407, and became superior in 1423, and again in 1447.

Thomas Aquinas, or of Aquino. See Aquinas, Thomas.

Thomas Becket or a Becket. See Thomas of London.

Thomasists (tō'mists). The followers of Thomas Aquinas. He held two sources of knowledge—faith and reason—the doctrines of unconditional predestination and efficacious grace, and a physical as well as a moral efficacy; and denied the doctrine of the immaculate conception. His theology, embodied in his great work "Summa theologice," was based on a philosophical system rather than on either the Bible or the traditional teaching of the church. It was an attempt to reconcile Aristotelian philosophy with the Christian faith. It is of very high authority in the Roman Catholic Church, and its influence is great even outside of that church.

Thompson (tomp'son), Benjamin, Count Ram-ford. Born at Woburn, Mass., March 26, 1753; died at Auteuil, near Paris, Aug. 21, 1814. An American scientist and Bavarian administrator. Having been refused a commission in the Continental army, he offered his services to the British, and in 1776 was sent to England with despatches from General William Howe. Here he was given a place in the administrative service by Lord George Germain, secretary of state for the colonies, and rose to the post of under-secretary of state (1780). He was elected a fellow of the Royal Society in 1779. On the retirement of his patron, he returned in 1781 to America, and raised in New York the "King's American Dragoons," of which he was commissioned lieutenant-colonel. He returned to England before the close of the war, and in 1784 accepted a confidential appointment with the rank of aide-de-camp and chamberlain at the court of the Elector of Bavaria. He reorganized the military establishment of Bavaria, and introduced important economic and other reforms, with the result that he was rapidly promoted to the highest offices in the state, including those of commander-in-chief of the general staff, minister of war, and superintendent of the police. He was created a count in the Holy Roman Empire in 1791. Owing to ill health he quitted Bavaria about 1798, and was for a time a private agent of Bavaria in England. He removed to Paris in 1802, and in 1804 married as his second wife the widow of the French chemist Lavoisier. The rest of his life was spent at his wife's villa in Auteuil. He gave $5,000 to the American Academy of Arts and Sciences and a like amount to the Royal Society of London to found prizes bearing his name for the most important discoveries in heat and light. He left to Harvard the funds with which the Rumford professorship of the physical and mathematical sciences as applied to the useful arts has been erected.

Carpenter, he conducted the deep-sea dredging expeditions in the war-ships Lightning and Porcupine (1868-69). He is best known as the director of the scientific staff of the important Challenger expedition for deep-sea exploration (1872-76). In 1877 he published "The Voyage of the Challenger," descriptive of its general results. He was knighted in 1876, and is generally designated Sir Wyville Thomson.

Thomson, James. Born at Ednam, Roxburghshire, Scotland, Sept. 11, 1700; died near Richmond, England, Aug. 27, 1748. A British poet. He was educated at Edinburgh, and studied for the church; was private tutor for a short time; and held several sinecure offices. He wrote "The Seasons" ("Winter," 1726; "Summer," 1727; "Spring," 1728; "Autumn," 1730), "The Castle of Indolence" (1748), an "Ode to the Memory of Sir Isaac Newton" (1727), "Liberty" (1734-36), and the plays "Sophonisba" (1730), containing the famous line (which killed the piece) "O Sophonisba, Sophonisba O," parodied by every one as "O Jimmy Thomson, Jimmy Thomson O" and "Agamemnon" (1738), the masque "Alfred," in conjunction with Mallet (1740), and "Tancred and Sigismunda" (1745).

Thomson, James. Born at Port Glasgow, Scotland, Nov. 23, 1834; died at London, June 3, 1882. A Scottish poet, known as "the poet of despair." He became a lawyer's clerk in 1862; later came to America as a mining agent; was war correspondent in Spain; and during the last years of his life labored as a journalist. He is best known as the author of "The City of Dreadful Night" (1880). He also wrote "Vane's Story," "A Voice from the Nile" (1884), and "Shelley, a Poem" (1885).

Thomson, William. Born Feb. 11, 1819; died Dec. 25, 1890. An English prelate and author, archbishop of York 1862. He wrote "Outline of the Necessary Laws of Thought" (1842), and theological works.

Thomson, William, first Lord Kelvin. Born at Belfast, Ireland, June, 1824. A celebrated British mathematician and physicist, professor of natural philosophy in Glasgow University 1846-1899. He has made important investigations in the domains of heat, electricity, and magnetism; invented the mirror-galvanometer and siphon-recorder, various forms of apparatus used in navigation and deep-sea exploration, and has otherwise done much for the advancement of practical electricity; and took a prominent part in the laying of the first submarine cables in the Atlantic. He is joint author with Professor P. G. Tait of "An Elementary Treatise on Natural Philosophy," and has besides written extensively on theoretical subjects connected with geology, terrestrial physics, tidal phenomena, etc. He was the first boldly to enunciate the doctrine, now largely received by geologists and mathematical physicists, that the earth has the rigidity of steel or glass, and is practically solid to the center. He was president of the British Association in 1871; was knighted in 1866; and was created Baron Kelvin in 1892.

Thomson, William McClure. Born near Cincinnati, Dec. 31, 1806; died April 8, 1894. An American Presbyterian missionary in Syria and Palestine, and biblical archaeologist. He wrote "The Land and the Book" (1859), "The Land of Promise" (1865), etc.

Thopas, Sir. See Rime of Sir Thopas.

Thor (thór or tor). [Icel. Thorr = AS. Thunor, thunder.] The second principal god of the ancient Scandinavians; the god of thunder. He was the son of Odin, or the supreme being, and Jorth, the earth. He was the champion of the gods, and was called to their assistance whenever they were in straits. He was also the friend of mankind, and the slayer of trolls and evil spirits. He always carried a heavy hammer (Mjöllnir, "the crusher"), which, as often as he discharged it, returned to his hand of itself, and he possessed a griddle which had the virtue of renewing his strength. Thor is represented as a powerful man, in the prime of life, with a long red beard.

Thospitis (thos-pi'tis). The ancient name of Lake Van.

Thoth (thoth or tōt), Eg. Tehuti (te-hō'te). An Egyptian divinity whom the Greeks assimilated to their Hermes (Mercury). He was the god of speech and hieroglyphics or letters, and of the reckoning of time, and the source of wisdom. The cynocephalous ape and the ibis were sacred to him. He is represented as a human figure, usually with the head of an ibis, and frequently with the moon-disk and crescent. Also Tat.

Thot (Tehuti) is generally drawn with an ibis head, or as a dog-ape. We recognize in him the moon-god, but he generally appears as the god of civilization (of intelligence and writing), or as the god who protects and revives dead bodies. He is worshipped more especially at Seseun (Hermopolis) and in the peninsula of Sinai.

La Saussaye, Science of Religion, p. 410.

Thothmes (thoth'mēs or tōt'mēs) I., Egypt. Tehuti-mes, pren. Aa-kheper-ka-Ra. [Tehuti's child.] Lived about 1633 B. C. (Brugsch). An Egyptian king of the 18th dynasty. He was a successful warrior, and conducted a campaign as far as the Euphrates. An important record of his deeds is preserved in an inscription on the rocks in the neighborhood of the third cataract.

Thothmes II., Eg. Tehuti-mes, pren. Aa-kheper-en-Ra. Lived about 1600 B. C. (Brugsch). An Egyptian king of the 18th dynasty, son of Thothmes I. He married his sister Hatshepsu, who obtained control of the government.

Thothmes III., Eg. Tehuti-mes, pren. Men-kheper-Ra. Lived about 1600 B. C. (Brugsch). A famous Egyptian king of the 18th dynasty. He reigned for 54 years, and under him "Egypt, to use the poetic expression of the time, 'placed her frontiers where she would.'" Her empire consisted of the whole of Abyssinia, the Sūdān, Nubia, Egypt proper, Syria, Mesopotamia, Irak-Arabia, Kurdistan, and Armenia (Mariette). He married his sister Hatshepsu, widow of Thothmes II. The records of his reign are extensive.

Now, Thothmes III. was the Alexander of ancient Egyptian history. He conquered the known world of his day; he carved the names of six hundred and twenty-eight vanquished nations and captured cities on the walls of Karnak; and he set up a tablet of Victory in the Great Temple. It is in this famous tablet, engraved with the oldest heroic poem known to science, that we find the Greeks mentioned for the second time in Egyptian history. Edwards, Pharaohs, Fellahs, etc., p. 160.

He had charge of political matters in the ministry of foreign affairs 1852-55; became ambassador at Constantinople in 1855; and was minister of foreign affairs 1860-62.

Thrace (thrās) A region in southeastern Europe, with varying boundaries: the ancient Thracia (Gr. Θράκη). In early times it was regarded as the entire region north of Greece. As a Roman province it was bounded by the Hæmus or Balkan (separating it from Mæsia) on the north; the Euxine and Bosphorus on the east; the Propontis, Hellespont, and Egean sea on the south, and the Nestus (separating it from Macedonia) on the west; corresponding, therefore, to Eastern Rumelia and part of Turkey. The principal mountain-range is the Rhodope; the principal river, the Hebrus. Greek colonies were planted at Byzantium, on the Thracian Chersonesus, and at Abdera, Perinthus, etc. The climate was notable for its severity, and the inhabitants for their ferocity and barbarity. The affinities of the ancient inhabitants are unknown: they may have been ancestors of the Wallachs. In the 5th century B. C. Thrace was largely under the rule of Teres, king of the Odrysæ. It was successively under Macedonian, Roman, Byzantine, and Turkish rule.

The wide stretch of country between the lower course of the Danube and the shores of the Egean and the Propontis was occupied in antiquity by the tribe of the Thracians, which Herodotus (v. 3) regards as the greatest of all peoples next to the Indi. The scanty remains of the Thracian language are enough to establish traces of its Indo-Germanic character, but not enough to define its position in the Indo-European family more closely. Certain it is, however, that from hence a large part of Asia Minor received its Indo-Germanic population. In the first place, it is known that the Thracians themselves spread eastwards over the strait a considerable distance towards Asia. According to the unanimous opinion of antiquity, again, the Phrygians emigrated from Europe, and were originally connected with the Thracians.

Schrader, Aryan Peoples (tr. by Jevons), p. 430.

Thrace A diocese of the later Roman prefecture of the East. It extended from the Egean and the Propontis to the lower Danube, comprising the eastern parts of Bulgaria and Rumelia.

Throop (trōp), Enos Thompson. Born at Johnstown, N. Y., Aug. 21, 1784; died near Auburn, N. Y., 1874. An American Democratic politician. He was member of Congress from New York 1815-16; was elected lieutenant-governor of New York in 1828; succeeded Van Buren as governor March, 1829; was re-elected as governor in 1830 and served until 1833; and was chargé d'affaires at Naples 1838-42.

Thrym (trīm). [ON. Thrymr.] In Old Norse mythology, the giant who stole from Thor his hammer Mjölnir.

Thuanus. See Thou.

Thuban (thū-bān'). [Ar. al-thūbān, the dragon.] The star α Draconis, now of the fourth magnitude only, though three hundred years ago it was estimated as of the second. About B. C. 2750 it was the pole-star, and at one time was within 10' of the true pole itself.

Thucydides (thū-sid'i-dēz). [Gr. Θουκυδίδης.] Born probably 471 B. C.; died probably about 401 B. C. A celebrated Greek historian. He was a native of Athens; belonged to a family which claimed blood-relationship with Miltiades and Cimon; is said to have been a pupil of Antiphon of Rhamnus and of Anaxagoras; and possessed an ample fortune, part of which was invested in gold-mines in Thrace, opposite Thasos. In 424 he commanded an expedition sent to the assistance of Amphipolis against Brasidas, but failed to prevent the capture of the city, and in consequence went into exile (whether enforced or voluntary is unknown), from which he returned twenty years later, in 403. He was commonly supposed by the ancients to have died a violent death soon after, probably at Athens. He began a "History of the Peloponnesian War," which he did not live to finish, the narrative ending in 411, seven years before the end of the war. The Greek text was first printed by Aldus at Venice in 1502.

Thugut (tū'gōt), Baron Franz Maria von. Born at Linz, Austria, March 8, 1739; died at Vienna, May 29, 1818. An Austrian diplomatist and politician. He was ambassador at Constantinople 1771-76; was employed later in various diplomatic missions; and was minister of foreign affairs for nearly all of the period 1794-1800. Among the events of his ministry were the wars with France, the loss of Belgium and Lombardy, and the acquisition of Western Galicia and Venice.

Thule (thū'lē). [Gr. Θούλη.] The name given by Pytheas of Marseilles to a region or island north of Great Britain, the position of which has been for more than two thousand years the subject of investigation and a matter of controversy. Of the voyage of Pytheas, who was probably nearly contemporaneous with Alexander the Great, nothing is known with certainty, since none of his writings has been preserved. It is, on the whole, most probable that he followed the east coast of Great Britain (of whose size he got a very much exaggerated idea), and that he obtained information in regard to the groups of islands lying still further north — namely, the Orkney and Shetland Islands — which he embraced under the general name of Thule. From what he is believed to have said in regard to the length of the day in Thule at the summer solstice, it is evident that, as he is known to have been a skilled astronomer, he thought that this land was situated on or near the Arctic Circle. The Romans frequently added to Thule the designation of "Ultima" (the Farthest Thule), and, from classic times down to the present day, Thule, besides remaining a subject for voluminous controversy among geographical critics, has been in constant use by poets and others as designating some unknown, far-distant, northern, or purely mythical region, or even some goal, not necessarily geographical, sought to be attained. This use of Thule and Ultima Thule runs throughout the literature of all the cultivated languages of Europe.

"Ultima Thule," the furthest of the "Britannic Isles," has been identified with all sorts of localities since the time when Pytheas sailed with his Cimbric guides to the country of the midnight sun. The controversy is boundless, and its details are too tedious to be examined at length. But we may select sufficient evidence to show why the story of the journey should be believed, and to justify the selection of Lapland as the northern limit of the expedition. Ed'ton, Origins of Eng. Hist., p. 64.

Thun (tōn). A town in the canton of Bern, Switzerland, situated at the exit of the Aare from the Lake of Thun, 16 miles southeast of Bern. It is a frequented tourist center, and has considerable trade. Population (1888), 5,605.

Thun, Lake of, G. Thunersee (tōn'ēr-zū). A lake in the canton of Bern, Switzerland, south-east of Bern and west of the Lake of Brienz.

It is traversed by the Aare. Length, 11 miles. Width, nearly 2 miles.

Thunberg (tōn'berg), Karl Peter. Born at Jönköping, Sweden, Nov. 11, 1743; died near Upsala, Aug. 8, 1828. A Swedish botanist and traveler, a pupil of Linnæus. He wrote, besides his travels (1788), "Flora Japonica," "Flora Capensis," "Icones plantarum Japonicarum," etc.

Thunder Bay (thun'dēr bā). A bay of Lake Huron, on the eastern coast of Michigan, intersected by lat. 45° N.

Thunderbolt of Italy, The. Gaston de Foix.
Thunderer (thun'dēr-ēr), The. A name given to the London "Times."

Thundering Legion, The. In Christian tradition, a legion of Christians in the army of Marcus Aurelius, in battle with the Quadi, whose prayers for rain were answered by a thunder-shower which refreshed the thirsty Romans while it destroyed numbers of the enemy by lightning.

Thur (tör). A river in the cantons of St. Gall, Thurgau, and Zurich, Switzerland, which joins the Rhine 7 miles south by west of Schaffhausen. Length, about 75 miles.

Thuralpen (tör'äl-pen). A group of the Alps in the cantons of St. Gall and Appenzel, Switzerland, north of the Lake of Wallenstadt and west of the Rhine. They culminate in the Sentsis (which see).

Thurgau (tör'gou), F. Thurgovie (tür-gō-vē'). A canton of Switzerland, bounded by Schaffhausen, Baden (from which it is separated by the Rhine and the Unter See), the Lake of Constantine, St. Gall, and Zurich. Capital, Frauenfeld. It sends 5 members to the National Council. The language is German, and about two thirds of the inhabitants are Protestant. In the early middle ages Thurgau included northeastern Switzerland. It fell to the Hapsburgs in the 13th century; was conquered by the Swiss Confederation in 1460, and ruled by them as a subject district until 1798; and became an independent canton in 1803. The present constitution was adopted in 1869. Area, 381 square miles. Population (1888), 104,678.

Thurii (thū'ri-i), or Thurium (thū'ri-um). In ancient geography, a city of Magna Græcia, Italy, situated near the ancient Sybaris and near the modern Terranova. It was founded by fugitives from Sybaris in 452 B. C., who were soon expelled by Croton; and was refounded by colonists from Athens and other cities about 443. It was defeated by the Lucanians in 390 B. C.; called Rome to its aid against Tarantum in 282; and later was subject to Rome. It was plundered by Hannibal in 204 B. C., and had a Roman colony planted in it in 194 B. C.

Thüringerwald (tū'ring-er-vālt). [G. 'Thuringian Forest.'] A mountain-range in central Germany, connected by the Frankenwald with the Fichtelgebirge on the southeast, and with the Rhöngebirge on the southwest; famed for picturesque scenery and for the legends connected with it. Length, 95 miles. Highest point, Grosser Beerberg (3,226 feet).

Thuringia (thū-rin'ji-ä), G. Thüringen (tū'ring-en), F. Thuringe (tū-rañzh'). A region in central Germany, included between the Harz, the Werra, the Saale, and Franconia. It comprises in large part the hilly and mountainous district of the Thüringerwald. The Thuringians were probably descended from the ancient Hermunduri, with admixture of other tribes. They appeared in history in the 5th century, and extended their power from the Elbe to the Danube; but were overthrown by the Austrasian Franks in the first part of the 6th century. Thuringia soon became practically independent. Later it was an important landgraviate; the line of landgraves became extinct in 1247. In 1263 Meissen secured most of the Thuringian territory, which eventually passed to the Saxon states. See Thuringian States and Heise (landgraviate).

Thuringian (thū-rin'ji-an) Gates. Two heights in the basin of the Unstrut in Thuringia, situated near Sachsenburg.

Thuringian Saale. See Saale.

Thuringian States. Those German states which correspond nearly to ancient Thuringia. They are Saxe-Attenburg, Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, Saxe-Meiningen, Saxe-Weimar-Eisenach, Schwarzburg-Rudolstadt, Schwarzburg-Sondershausen, Reuss (elder line), Reuss (younger line), and parts of Prussia, and a few other exclaves.

Thurkill (thēr'kel), or Thurkill (thēr'kil), or Thurcytel. Lived in the first part of the 11th century. A Danish pirate leader, allied with Sweyn and afterward with Æthelred. He was earl of East Anglia under Canute.

Thurles (thēr'lez). A town in the county of Tipperary, Ireland, situated on the Suir 34 miles east of Limerick. It is the seat of a Roman Catholic archbishop, and was the scene of a battle between the Danes and the Irish in the 10th century. Population (1891), 4,511.

Thurloe (thēr'lo), John. Born 1616; died 1668. An English politician, secretary of state 1653-1660. His "State Papers" were edited by Birch in 1742.

Thurlow (thēr'lō), Edward, Baron Thurlow. Born at Bracon-Ash, Norfolk, 1732; died at Brighton, Sept. 12, 1806. An English jurist and statesman. He was educated at Cambridge (Catus College); became king's counsel in 1761; entered Parliament in 1768; was made solicitor-general in 1770 and attorney-general in 1771; and was lord chancellor 1778-83 and 1783-92. He was a Tory leader in the House of Lords, and a bitter opponent of the American colonists.

Thurman (thēr'man), Allen Granberry. Born at Lynchburg, Va., Nov. 13, 1813; died Dec. 12, 1895. An American statesman and jurist. He was admitted to the bar in 1835; was Democratic member of Congress from Ohio 1845-47; became judge of the Ohio Supreme Court in 1851; was chief justice 1854-56; was the (unsuccessful) Democratic candidate for governor of Ohio in 1867; and was United States senator 1869-81. He served as chairman of the judiciary committee; promoted the passage of the "Thurman Act," compelling the Pacific railroads to fulfill their obligations to the government; was United States commissioner at the international monetary conference in Paris in 1881; was a prominent candidate for the Democratic nomination for President in 1876, 1880, and 1884; and was the (unsuccessful) Democratic candidate for Vice-President in 1888.

He served as a naval engineer in the Civil War; was detailed as assistant professor of natural philosophy at the naval academy in 1865; resigned from the navy in 1872; was professor of mechanical engineering in the Stevens Institute, Hoboken, 1871-85; and since 1885 has been director of Sibley College, Cornell University. He was United States commissioner at the Vienna Exposition in 1873; and has been a member of various United States scientific boards. Among his works are "Report on Machinery and Manufactures" (Vienna Exposition), "History of the Growth of the Steam-Engine" (1878), "Materials of Engineering" (1884-86), "Materials of Construction" (1885), "A Manual of Steam Boilers, etc." (1888), etc.

Thyatira (thū-a-tī-rū). [Gr. Θάτυρα.] In ancient geography, a city of Lydia, on the site of the modern Akhissar; also called, in antiquity, Pelopeia, Euhippa, and Semiramis. It was one of the seven cities of Asia Minor mentioned in the Book of Revelation.

Thyestes (thī-es'tēz). [Gr. Θυέστης.] In Greek legend, son of Pelops, brother of Atreus, and father of Ægisthus. Thyestes seduced the wife of Atreus and attempted his life; in revenge Atreus slew the sons of Thyestes and served them up to their father to eat.

Thymbrius (thim'bri-us). In ancient geography, a small river near Hium.

Thyrsis (thēr'sis). A herdsman in the "Idylls" of Theocritus; a shepherd in the "Eclogues" of Vergil; in later literature, a rustic or shepherd.

Thyrus (thēr'sus). The ancient name of the Tiro.

Ti (tē). See the extract.

In marked contrast to the plebeian type of Ra-em-ka is the limestone statue of one Ti, a courtly gentleman of the Fifth Dynasty. No less than nineteen statues of Ti were found immured in the substance of the walls of his tomb, which is one of the most beautiful in Egypt. The figure stands about seven feet high, the flesh-tints being of a pale brick dust color, and the wig yellow. The pose of the head is spritely, and the expression of the face is open and lifelike. Ti's shoulders are very square, his arms long, his body slender; this being the characteristic type of the well-grown fellah of the present day.

Edwards, Monarchs, Fellahs, etc., p. 110.

Tiahuanaco (tē-ā-wā-nū'kō). [So called from a neighboring village.] A remarkable group of very ancient ruins in western Bolivia, 12 miles from the southern end of Lake Titicaca, near the Peruvian frontier, and about 12,900 feet above the sea. They include remains of several very large quadrilateral buildings, monolithic doorways, broken statues, etc. The material is generally hard sandstone or trachyte, often in immense blocks, and must have been transported 25 miles by water and 15 by land. The blocks were cut and fitted together with great skill, the joining being by mortises and bolts. Many of them are elaborately sculptured. The largest and most remarkable of the monolithic doorways is 13 feet wide, over 7 feet high (now above the ground) and 2 feet thick; above the level of the door it is covered with sculptures in low relief, consisting of a central human figure and four rows of smaller figures, some with condors' heads and all with crowns and scepters. The structure called the "fortress" is an artificial mound or truncated pyramid, 620 feet long by 150 wide and 50 high, originally formed with terraces which were faced with blocks of cut stone. The style of architecture and sculpture in the Tiahuanacu buildings is absolutely unique, and the exactness of the squaring and joining is unsurpassed even by the most noted ancient and modern works of the Old World. Many of the walls have been destroyed by treasure-hunters, or to obtain materials for buildings in the vicinity and even in La Paz; portions have been blown up with gunpowder. The Tiahuanacu ruins had been abandoned long before the Spanish conquest, and the Indians knew nothing of their origin. The best authorities now connect them with the traditional race called Piruas (which see). As the cold and sterile region about Lake Titicaca is unfit to support a large population, it is conjectured that the buildings had a religious or ceremonial object. Some traditions connect them with the first Incas. Also written Tiahuanacu.

Tiamat (tê-â'mât). In Assyro-Babylonian cosmogony, the personification of the primeval chaos, the beginning of all. It is hostile to the gods, to law and order, and is depicted in the form of a dragon. Bel-Merodach conquers the monster in a struggle, driving a wind into its opened jaw and splitting it in twain.

Tian-Shan, or Thian-Shan (tê-ân' shân), or Celestial Mountains. A mountain system in central Asia, extending from about long. 75° to 95° E. Between about long. 75° and 80° E. it forms the boundary between East Turkestan and Russian Central Asia. By some geographers the Trans-Alai and Hissar Mountains, lying southwest of the main chain, are considered to be a part of the Tian-Shan. The Khan Tengri, assumed to be the culminating point of the range, is said to have an elevation of 24,000 feet.

Tiber (tî'bër). [It. Tevere, L. Tiberis, Tibris, Tybris, Tiberinus, Gr. Τιβέρις, Τιβέριος; said to have been called earlier Alba or Albas or Albula, white river.] The second largest river in Italy. It rises in the Apennines about 20 miles north-northeast of Arezzo, flows generally south, and empties into the Mediterranean 16 miles southwest of Rome, which is on its banks. Its chief tributaries are the Chiana, Nera, and Teverone. Length, about 250 miles.

Tiber. A colossal recumbent statue, of the period of the early Roman Empire, in the Louvre, Paris. Romulus and Remus, with the wolf, are at the river-god's side.

Tiberias (tî-bê'ri-as). [Gr. Τιβεριάς; named by its founder from the emperor Tiberius.] A town in Palestine, situated on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee, 17 miles east-northeast of Nazareth; the modern Tabariya. It was founded by Herod Antipas in the first half of the 1st century A. D.; was long a seat of Hebrew learning; was a bulwark of the Crusaders; and was taken by Saladin in 1187. Population, 3,000.

Tiberias, Battle of. A victory of Saladin over the Crusaders under Guy of Lusignan in 1187. It was followed by the capture of Jerusalem.

Tiberias, Lake or Sea of. See Galilee, Sea of.
Tiberius (tî-bê'ri-us), Tiberius Claudius Nero Cæsar. Born Nov. 16, 42 B. C.; died March 16, 37 A. D. Roman emperor, son of Tiberius Claudius Nero and Livia Drusilla, and stepson of Augustus; infamous for his vices and cruelty. He was divorced by command of Augustus from his wife Vipsania Agrippina (daughter of Agrippa), and 11 B. C. married Livia, daughter of Augustus and widow of Agrippa; served in Spain, in Armenia, against the Rhodians and Vindelicians, and on the Danube; became consul in 13 B. C., and tribune in 6 B. C.; spent several years practically in exile in Rhodes; returned to Rome in 2 A. D.; was adopted by Augustus in 4 A. D.; conducted several campaigns in Germany, Pannonia, and Dalmatia; and succeeded Augustus as emperor in 14 A. D. His administration of the affairs of the empire was generally successful, but his private life, especially in his later years (which were passed in large part on the island of Capri), was marked by gross vices and cruelty toward his enemies. His chief minister was Sejanus.

Tiberius. Byzantine emperor 578-582.

Tibesti (tê-bes-tê'), or Tu (tô). A district in the eastern part of the Sahara, in the region inhabited by the Tibbus.

Tibet, or Thibet (tîb'et or ti-bet'). A land in central Asia; a dependency of China. It is bounded by the Kwenlun Mountains on the north (separating it from Eastern Turkestan), by China proper on the east, by the Himalaya on the south (separating it from British India, Bhutan, Nepal, etc.), and by Kashmir on the west. Chief city, Lhasa. The surface is an elevated tableland; the interior is little known. It contains the sources of the Indus, Brahmaputra, Yangtse-Kiang, and other large rivers. The foreign and military affairs of Tibet are directed by imperial delegates; the supreme civil authority is vested in the dalai-lama. The inhabitants are of Mongoloid race; the religion Lamaism and the Bon religion. Tibet became subject to China in the 17th century. Area, about 750,000 square miles. Population, about 1,000,000.

Tibet, Little. See Balistan.

Tibet, Middle. See Ladak.

Tibullus (ti-bul'us), Albius. Born about 54 B. C.; died 18 B. C. A Roman elegiac poet. He was patronized by Messala whom he accompanied in a campaign to Aquitania. He wrote the first two of the books extant under his name.

Tibur (tî'bër). The ancient name of Tivoli.

Tiburón (tê-bô-rôn'). ['Shark' island.] An island in the Gulf of California, about lat. 29°

N., belonging to the state of Sonora, Mexico. Length, about 34 miles. The only inhabitants are a few Seri Indians.

Tichborne (tich'born), Roger Charles. Born Jan. 5, 1829; died at sea, 1854. The presumptive heir to the Tichborne estates in England. He sailed from Rio de Janeiro for New York, April 20, 1854, on the Bella, which was lost. A famous trial for the recovery of the estates by Arthur Orton, the Tichborne claimant (see Orton), was decided against the claimant in 1872. Orton was tried for perjury 1873-74, and imprisoned 1874-1884.

Ticino (tê-chê'nô). [L. Ticinus, F. Tessin, G. Tessin.] A river in Switzerland and Italy, formed by the junction of two head streams near Airolo. It traverses the Val Leventina and the Riviera in the canton of Ticino, Lago Maggiore, and the Lombard plain, and joins the Po near Pavia. Its chief tributaries are the Brenno and Mousa. Length, about 150 miles.

Ticino. [F. Tessin, G. Tessin.] A canton of Switzerland, bounded by Valais, Uri, Grisons, and Italy. Capital, Bellinzona. It sends 6 members to the National Council. The inhabitants are Italian in race and language, and Roman Catholic in religion. It was subjugated by Rome with the rest of Gallia Cisalpina; and fell under the power of the Ostrogoths in the 5th century, of the Longobards in the 6th, and of the Franks in the 8th. In the middle ages it was held in large part by Milan. The Val Leventina was conquered by Uri in 1403, and finally in 1440; and the remainder of Ticino was taken by the confederates and the Forest Cantons about 1500. It was divided into the cantons of Bellinzona and Lugano in 1798, and these were consolidated in 1803. A constitution was adopted in 1830. The canton has been disturbed by contests between the Ultramontanes and the radicals, and the intervention of federal troops was necessary in 1876 and 1890. Area, 1,088 square miles. Population (1888), 126,751.

Ticinum (ti-sî'nûm). The Roman name of Pavia.

Ticinus (ti-sî'nûs). The Roman name of the river Ticino.

Ticinus, Battle of the. A victory gained near the Ticinus and probably near Pavia, 218 B. C., by Hannibal over the Romans under Publius Scipio; chiefly a cavalry engagement.

Tickell (tik'el), Thomas. Born at Bridekirk, Cumberland, 1686; died at Bath, April 23, 1740.

An English poet. In 1708 he graduated at Queen's College, Oxford. He was a friend of Addison, and through him in 1717 was appointed under-secretary of state. His poem on "The Prospect of Peace" appeared in 1713, and a poem, "Kensington Gardens," in 1722. He contributed to the "Spectator" and "Guardian," and wrote the elegy on Addison prefixed to his edition of Addison's works in 1721; his finest work. He translated the first book of the "Iliad," which Pope suspected was done by Addison, and wrote the popular ballad "Colin and Lucy."

Ticket-of-Leave Man, The. A play by Tom Taylor, produced in 1863. It is from the French play "Leonard," by Edouard Brisbarre and Eugène Nus.

Ticknor (tik'nôr), George. Born at Boston, Mass., Aug. 1, 1791; died there, Jan. 26, 1871. An American author. He graduated at Dartmouth in 1807; was admitted to the bar in 1813; resided at Göttingen and elsewhere in Europe 1815-19; and was professor of French, Spanish, and belles-lettres at Harvard 1819-1835. He spent the years 1835-38 in Europe. He was one of the founders of the Boston public library. His chief work is a "History of Spanish Literature" (1849). He also wrote various essays, and a life of Prescott (1864). His life and letters were published in 1876.

Ticonderoga (ti-kon-de-rô'gâ). A town in Essex County, New York, situated on the outlet from Lake George to Lake Champlain, 88 miles north by east of Albany. It was fortified by the French in 1755, and was called at first Carillon; was the rendezvous of Montcalm's army in 1757; was unsuccessfully attacked by the British under Abercrombie July 8, 1758; was invested and taken by the British under Amherst in 1759; was surprised and captured by the Americans under Ethan Allen, May 10, 1775; was taken by the British under Burgoyne in July, 1777; and was taken by the British under Haldeman in 1780. Population (1900), 5,048; village, 1,911.

Tidewater (tid'wâ'ter). A section of Virginia extending from the sea-coast westward as far as the rivers are affected by the tides.

Tieck (têk), Ludwig. Born at Berlin, May 31, 1773; died there, April 28, 1853. A German poet and critic. He studied at Halle, Göttingen, and Erlangen. Subsequently he lived alternately in Berlin, Jena, and Dresden. In 1805 he undertook a journey to Italy, and in 1817 to England. In 1820 he was made a member of the direction of the royal theater at Dresden. In 1841 he was called to Berlin by Frederick William IV., by whom he was granted a pension. Among his many works in almost all departments of literature are particularly to be mentioned two collections of popular tales, partly from old German sources, partly original, "Volksmärchen" ("Folk Tales," 1797) and "Phantasus" (1812-17), the romantic novel "Franz Sternbald's Wanderungen" ("Franz Sternbald's Wanderings," 1798), the classical translation of "Don Quixote" (1799-1801), a modern German version of "Middleg High German" "Minnelieder" ("Minnesongs," 1803). After 1825 he was engaged upon a translation of Shakspeare to complete the work begun by A. W. von Schlegel. In 1823 and 1827, during his connection with the Dresden theater, he published a series of dramatic criticisms under the title of "Dramaturgische Blätter" ("Dramaturgic Leaves"). Other works are the two novels with which he began his literary career, "Abdallah" and "William Lovell"; the comedies "Blaubart" ("Bluebeard"), "Der gestiefelte Kater" ("Puss in Boots"), "Prinz Zerbino" ("Prince Zerbino"); the dramas "Leben und Tod der heiligen Genoveva" ("The Life and Death of St. Genoveva"), "Kaiser Oktavianus" ("Emperor Octavianus"), "Fortunat" ("Fortunatus") ("Empress Octavia"). Among his many shorter stories, written between 1821 and 1840, are especially to be named "Das Dichtenloben" ("The Poet's Life"), which describes the youth of Shakspeare, and "Der Tod des Dichters" ("The Death of the Poet"), whose motive is the death of the poet Lamons. He wrote, besides, many lyrics, the best of which are in his Italian journey in 1805-06. He was the most prolific of the poets of the Romantic school in Germany. A collection of his writings, made by himself, was published in Berlin, 1828-46, in 20 vols.; his critical writings, in the same way, appeared in Berlin 1852-54; and his short stories ("Gesammelte Novellen") were published in Berlin, 1852-53, in 12 vols. His posthumous works ("Nachgelassene Schriften") appeared at Leipzig, 1855, in 2 vols.

Tiedemann (tê-de-mân), Diétrich. Born at Bremervörde, near Bremen, April 3, 1748; died at Marburg, Sept. 24, 1803. A German philosopher, professor of philosophy at Marburg from 1776. His chief work is "Geist der spekulativen Philosophie" (1791-96).

Tiedge (têd'ge), Christoph August. Born at Gardelegen, Prussia, Dec. 14, 1752; died at Dresden, March 8, 1841. A German poet. His chief work is the lyrico-didactic poem "Urania" (1800).

Tientsin (tê-en'tsên'). A city in the province of Chihli, China, situated on the Peilo in lat. 39° 9' N., long. 117° 12' E. It is an important center of transit trade, and the terminus of the imperial canal and of a railroad to Tongsan opened in 1888. A treaty was concluded here in 1858 between China on one side and Great Britain, the United States, France, and Russia on the other. Tientsin was occupied by the English and French in 1860, and was made an open port. A massacre of Christians occurred there in 1870. Captured by the allies July 14, 1900. Population, estimated, 950,000.

Tiepolo (tê-â'pô-lô), Giovanni Battista. Born at Venice, March 5, 1693; died at Madrid, March 25, 1769 (?). A Venetian painter, a pupil of Gregorio Lazzarini; the last great decorative painter of the Venetian school. He was influenced by Giovanni Battista Piazzetta, and still more by the works of Paolo Veronese. After painting frescos at Milan and other Italian cities, he decorated the episcopal palace at Würzburg, Bavaria, in 1750; and on his return to Venice in 1753 he was appointed first director of the Academy of Painting. In 1761 he was called to Spain by Charles III., and executed frescos in the royal palace, with the assistance of Giovanni Domenico Tiepolo, his son (1726-77). There are many of his easel-pictures in the galleries of Europe.

Tierney (têr'nî), George. Born at Gibraltar, March 20, 1761; died at London, Jan. 25, 1830.

An English Whig politician. He was educated at St. Peter's College, Cambridge, and was called to the bar, but devoted himself to politics. He entered Parliament as member for Colchester in 1788, and sat in the House of Commons for different constituencies from 1796 to his death. He was a prominent opponent of William Pitt. In 1798 Pitt accused him of want of patriotism, and fought a bloodless duel with him (May 27). In 1803 he joined the Addington ministry as treasurer of the navy, and in 1806 the Grenville ministry as president of the board of control. From 1817 he was the leader of the opposition in the House of Commons. He was master of the mint in Canning's ministry (1827), and also, with a seat in the cabinet, in Goderich's ministry (1827-28).

Tierra Bomba (tê-er'ra bom'bâ). A small island near the coast of Colombia, west of Cartagena.

Tierra de Canelo. See Cinnamon, Land of.

Tierra del Fuego (tê-er'ra del fwâ'gô), or Terra del Fuego. ['Land of Fire.'] 1. An archipelago south of the southern end of South America, from which it is separated by the Strait of Magellan. It comprises the large island of King Charles South Land (or Tierra del Fuego proper, or Fuegia) and the smaller Desolation Island, Clarence Island, Dawson Island, Navarin, Hoste, Horn, Wollaston, Stewart, Londonderry, etc.; these are separated from each other by narrow and tortuous channels, and the islands themselves are cut by deep fiords. The central and western parts of King Charles South Land, and most of the smaller islands, are mountainous and partly covered with forest. Politically it is divided nominally between the Argentine Republic and Chile. It was discovered by Magellan in 1520; and has been explored by Darwin, King, Wilkes, Bove, etc. Length of group, about 400 miles. Area, over 21,000 square miles. Population, estimated, about 3,000 (nearly all Indians). See Fuegians.

2. A territory of the Argentine Republic, comprising the Argentine portion of the archipelago (the eastern part of King Charles South Land and the Isla de los Estados). There are two small settlements established by Englishmen, one as a mission station. Gold is obtained in considerable quantities. Area, 8,217 square miles. Population, about 3,000.

Tierra Firme, or Costa Firme. See Spanish Main.

Tiers État (tyâr-zâ-tâ'). [F., 'third estate.'] In France, that portion of the nation which belonged neither to the nobility, nor the clergy (the two privileged classes), nor the peasantry. It consisted chiefly of the burghers who acted representatives to the States-General. The name was made famous by the struggles of the representatives of this order in the last French States-General for power equal to that of both the other orders, and their final assumption of supreme authority, consummating the Revolution.

Tiglath-Pileser (tig'lath-pî-lê'zêr). [Assyr. Tukulti-pal-eshara, my support is the son of the Eschara (i. e. Adar the god of war and the chase).] The name of three Assyrian kings. (a) King 1120-1109 B. C., one of the most warlike and energetic of Assyrian rulers. According to inscriptions on prisms found in the ruins of Kileh Sherghat (on the site of the ancient city of Ashur), he undertook campaigns against forty-two countries and their kings, among them the Moschoi Kummuch (Commagene), Hittites, the "Aramean river-land," the country of Nairi, and Babylonia. He also indulged in the adventures of the chase, and relates that he killed with his own hand 10 elephants and 920 lions. (b) King about 950-930 B. C. (c) King 745-727 B. C. In the Old Testament he bears the name of Thul. In 711 he conquered, after a three years' siege, the city of Arpad (modern Tell-Frad, north of Aleppo). In 738 he brought nineteen districts of Hamath under Assyrian supremacy. In the same year he received tribute from Rezin of Damascus, Menahem of Samaria (2 Ki. xv, 19), Hiram of Tyre, and many other kings of Syria. Several years later Rezin of Damascus and Pekah of Israel entered into a coalition against Assyria, and waged war against Ahaz of Judah because he would not join this alliance (Isa. vii.). At the behest of Ahaz, Tiglath-Pileser again marched against the west 734-732. Rezin was killed and the kingdom of Damascus destroyed, and many cities were taken from Israel (2 Ki. xv, 29), Pekah being left as a vassal king. While in Damascus the Assyrian king received tribute from Ahaz of Judah, and the kings of Moab, Asealon, Edom, Gaza, etc. For a third time Tiglath-Pileser took a hand in the policy of Israel when Pekah was assassinated by Hoshea. The Assyrian king, according to his account, placed Hoshea on the throne and received 10 talents of gold and 1,000 talents of silver as tribute. He also made several expeditions to Babylonia, against Urartu (743-735) and Elam (744-737).

Tigranes (tig-râ'nêz) I. [Gr. Τιγράνης.] Died after 56 B. C. King of Armenia, son-in-law of Mithridates the Great. He conquered Syria and part of Asia Minor, and founded Tigranocerta. He was defeated by Lucullus near Tigranocerta 69 B. C.; surrendered at Artaxata to Pompey; and was deprived of his conquests.

Tilden (tîl'den), Samuel Jones. Born at New Lebanon, N. Y., Feb. 9, 1814; died at Greystone, near Yonkers, N. Y., Aug. 4, 1886. A noted American statesman and lawyer. He was educated at Yale and at the University of New York; early took an active part in politics; was admitted to the bar in 1841; was elected as a Democrat to the New York Assembly in 1845, and was a member of the Constitutional Convention in 1846; became a Free-soiler in 1848; was the unsuccessful Democratic candidate for attorney-general in 1855; and became chairman of the Democratic State Committee in 1866. He was prominent in the successful contest against the "Tweed Ring"; and was elected Democratic governor of New York in 1874, and served 1875-76. He promoted the reform of the management of the canals. In 1876 he was Democratic candidate for President, and received about 250,000 more votes than Hayes, the Republican candidate, and 184 uncontested electoral votes (see Electoral Commission). The decision of the contest was in favor of Hayes. Tilden declined to be a candidate for the Democratic nomination for President in 1880 and 1884. His works were edited by John Bigelow (1885).

Tillemont (tîl-môn'), Sébastien le Nain de. Born at Paris, Nov. 30, 1637; died Jan. 10, 1698. A distinguished French historian. He was educated among the Jansenists at Port-Royal; resided for many years at Beauvais, occupied with his studies; returned to Paris in 1670; and in 1679 retired to Tillemont, near Montreuil. He wrote "Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire ecclésiastique des six premiers siècles" (1693-1712) and "Histoire des empereurs et des autres princes qui ont régné pendant les six premiers siècles de l'église" (1690-1738), and collaborated in the writings of the Port-Royalists.

For a perfect digest of all the authorities bearing on every fact in Roman Imperial history we naturally turn to Tillemont, who devoted the patient industry of a life to his two great works, "Mémoires Ecclésiastiques" and "Histoire des Empereurs."

Hodgkin, Italy and her Invaders, I. 91.

Tillotson (tîl'ot-son), John. Born at Sowerby, Yorkshire, England, Oct., 1630; died Nov. 22, 1694. An English prelate and theological writer. He was dean of Canterbury and of St. Paul's, and became archbishop of Canterbury in 1691. His collected works were published 1707-12.

Tilly (tîl'i; F. pron. tî-yê'), Count of (Johann Tserclaes). Born at the castle of Tilly, near Gembloux, Belgium, Feb., 1559; died at Ingolstadt, Bavaria, April 30, 1632. A famous general in the Spanish, Bavarian, and Imperial service. He served under Farnese in the Netherlands, and as lieutenant-colonel under Duke Philip Emanuel of Lorraine in Hungary against the Turks 1600-02; became field-marshal general and commander of the Bavarian army in 1610; was commander of the Catholic League at the beginning of the Thirty Years' War; gained the victory of the White Mountain, near Prague, Nov. 8, 1620; subdued Bohemia in 1621; conquered the Palatinate in 1622; defeated Christian of Brunswick at Stadtlohn Aug. 6, 1623, and Christian IV. of Denmark at Lutter Aug. 27, 1626; became imperial generalissimo in 1630; stormed Magdeburg May 20, 1631; was defeated by Gustavus Adolphus at Breitenfeld, near Leipsic, Sept. 17, 1631; and was mortally wounded in a contest with Gustavus Adolphus near the Lech, April 15, 1632. He was victorious in 36 battles.

Tilsit (tîl'sît). A town in the province of East Prussia, situated on the Memel 61 miles northeast of Königsberg. It has varied manufactures, and trade in lumber, fish, grain, hemp, wax, etc. It is famous from the peace between France on one side and Russia and Prussia on the other, agreed upon there in July, 1807. The meeting between Napoleon and Alexander took place on a raft in the river, June 25, 1807. The treaty between France and Russia was signed July 7, and that between France and Prussia July 9. According to the terms of the peace, the grand duchy of Warsaw was formed out of parts of Prussia; part of Prussia was ceded to Russia, and a small portion to Saxony; Dantzke was made free; the region west of the Elbe was ceded to Napoleon; the Confederation of the Rhine and Joseph, Louis, and Jérôme Bonaparte were recognized; Prussian harbors were closed to British trade; the Prussian army was reduced to 42,000; a secret conditional alliance was arranged between France and Russia; and large indemnities were to be paid by Prussia, which was reduced to a second-rate state. Population (1890), 24,645.

Tilton (tîl'ton), Theodore. Born at New York,

Oct. 2, 1835. An American editor, poet, and lecturer. He was editor of the "Independent" and founder of the "Golden Age." He is known chiefly from his suit against Henry Ward Beecher, begun in 1874, which resulted in the disagreement of the jury.

Timæus (tî-mô'us). [Gr. Τιμαίος.] Lived about 400 B. C. A Greek Pythagorean philosopher of Locri in Italy; the reputed author of a philosophical work, "On the Soul of the World," probably of a later period. He appears in Plato's dialogue named from him.

Timæus. Lived about 352-256 B. C. A Greek historian of Tauromenium in Sicily. He lived in exile in Athens. He wrote a history of Italy and Sicily from the earliest times to 264 B. C., fragments of which have been preserved.

Timan (tê-mân'). A plateau or group of low mountains in the governments of Vologda and Archangel, northeastern Russia.

Timanthes (tî-man'thêz). [Gr. Τιμάνθης.] Born in the island of Cythnos (?); lived about 400 B. C. A Greek painter of Sicily. He is known mainly as the painter of one of the great pictures of antiquity, the "Sacrifice of Iphigenia," in which Agamemnon conceals his uncontrollable grief by covering his head with his mantle. This picture was a favorite of Cicero. Pliny's remark that there is "always something more implied than expressed in his work" is suggestive of bold and generalized execution.

Timbuktu, or Timbuctoo (tim-buk'tô). A city of Africa, situated near the southern border of the Sahara and about 10 miles north of the Niger, about lat. 16° 47' N. It has considerable trade in gold, gum, salt, ivory, etc., being a center of various caravan routes from Morocco, the Guinea coast, and elsewhere. It was occupied by the Tuaregs in the 11th century, and later by Fellatahs, Arabs, and various other people. It has been visited by Laing, Caillie, Barth (1853), and Leuz (1880). Population, estimated, 20,000.

Times (tîmz), The London. The leading Conservative British newspaper, founded in 1785 under the title of "The London Daily Universal Register." The present name was adopted in 1788. The paper was developed under John Walter 1803-47.

Timocrate (tî-mô-krâ'tê'). A tragedy by Thomas Corneille, produced in 1666.

Timoga. See Timuquanan.

Timoleon (tî-mô'lê-on). [Gr. Τιμόλεων.] Born at Corinth; died 337 or 336 B. C. A celebrated Greek general and statesman. He favored the death of his brother Timophanes (tyrant of Corinth), and withdrew from public life; was sent from Corinth to aid Syracuse against Dionysius the Younger and Hicetas in 344; delivered Syracuse from Dionysius the Younger in 343; reorganized the city and the Greek power in Sicily; and defeated the Carthaginians at the Crimissus in 339 (?).

Timomachus (tî-mom'a-kus). [Gr. Τιμόμαχος.] Lived in the 1st century (?). B. C. A Byzantine painter. According to Pliny, Cæsar paid a large sum for two of his pictures, an Ajax and a Medea. The Medea of Timomachus was not less praised in song and epigram than the Aphrodite of Apelles. An echo of the original perhaps remains in some of the Pompeian wall-paintings. An Iphigenia in Tauris and a Gorgon were also celebrated. He seems to have shown tact in choosing the right moment just after or just before the catastrophe.

Timon (tî'mon). [Gr. Τίμων.] Lived in the last part of the 5th century B. C. An Athenian misanthrope. He is the subject of a tragedy by Shakspeare. See Timon of Athens.

Timone (tê-mô'ne). A comedy by Boiardo, produced before 1494; the first original Italian comedy.

Timon of Athens. A tragedy by Shakspeare, which unquestionably contains much by another hand. It was produced 1607-08 and printed in 1623, and was adapted by Shadwell.

Timon of Phlius (tî'us). Lived about 280 B. C. A Greek skeptical philosopher and author. He wrote satiric poems called "Silloi" (hence he was called the "sillographer"), in hexameter verse, ridiculing all the dogmatic schools of philosophy. Fragments of them survive.

Timor (tê-môr'). An island of the Malay Archipelago, lat. 8° 30' - 10° 20' S., long. 124° - 127° 30' E. The surface is mountainous; the southwestern part is claimed by the Netherlands, the northeastern by Portugal; the capital of the Dutch part is Kupang; that of the Portuguese, Deli. Length, about 300 miles. Area, about 12,000 square miles. Population (Papuas mixed with Malays, etc.), estimated, 500,000 to 600,000.

Timorlaut (tê-môr'lout), or Tenimber (te-nim'bôr). A group of islands in the Malay Archipelago, east by north of Timor and southwest of the Am Islands and of New Guinea; claimed by the Dutch. It comprises three large and several small islands (formerly supposed to form a whole). The formation is generally that of coral reefs and low. The inhabitants are largely Papuas. Area, about 2,000 square miles.

Timotes (tê-mô'tás). Indians of Venezuela, in the mountain region south and southeast of Lake Maracaibo, and the adjacent plains (state of Los Andes). The early explorers described them as agriculturists, divided into many small tribes or hordes (Tatuyes, Mocoobies, etc.), and having few arts. Those in the lowlands went naked and painted their bodies red; the mountain tribes wore a cotton mantle. They buried their dead in caves or, in some tribes (Mocochies, etc.), in artificial vaults. Their descendants are civilized, and occupy villages which take their names from the tribes. Their language, now nearly extinct, is said to have had relations with the Chibcha, but this is doubtful.

Timotheus (ti-mō'thē-us). [Gr. Τιμόθεος.] Died about 354 B. C. An Athenian naval commander, son of Conon. He conquered Coreyra in 375 n. c., and secured the favor of Acarnania, Cephalonia, and Epirus; took Samos from the Persians in 365; and was unjustly condemned during the Social War.

Timotheus. Born at Miletus; died about 357 B. C. A celebrated Athenian musician and dithyrambic poet. He improved the cithara by adding to it a string (the eleventh?).

Timothy (tim'ō-thi), or Timotheus. A Syrian Christian missionary, a disciple and companion of the apostle Paul.

Timour. Same as Timur or Tamerlane.

Timrod (tim'rod), Henry. Born at Charleston, S. C., Dec. 8, 1829; died at Columbia, S. C., Oct. 6, 1867. An American poet, author of Confederate war lyrics. His poems, with memoir by P. H. Hayne, were edited 1873.

Timsah (tim'sā), Lake. A small lake traversed by the Suez Canal, near Ismailia.

Timuquanan (tim-ō-kwān'an). ['Ruler' or 'master.']. A linguistic stock of North American Indians. The name was first used for a village or tribe upon St. John's River, Florida, but afterward to include the ancient tribes (now extinct) in that peninsula. When their towns were destroyed in 1706, the fugitives settled on the eastern coast, upon Tomoco River and the Mosquito Lagoon. There were 60 tribes or villages attributed to the stock, the names of which have been published. Also Atinua, Tinoga.

Timur, or Timour (tē-mōr'), or Timur Bey (tē-mōr' bā), also Timur-Leng (tē-mōr'leug) ('Timur the Lame'); corrupted to Tamerlane (tam-ēr-lān'). Born in central Asia, 1333; died 1405. A Tatar conqueror, said to have been descended from a follower of Jenghiz Khan. He became ruler about 1370 of a realm whose capital was Samarkand; conquered Persia, central Asia, and in 1398 a great part of India; waged war with the sultan Bajazet I., whom he defeated at Anceya in 1402 and took prisoner; and died while preparing to invade China. He is the Tamerlane of the plays.

Just at the moment when the Sultan [Bajazet] seemed to have attained the pinnacle of his ambition, when his authority was unquestionably obeyed over the greater part of the Byzantine Empire in Europe and Asia, when the Christian states were regarding him with terror as the scourge of the world, another and a greater scourge came to quell him, and at one stroke all the vast fabric of empire which Bayezid had so triumphantly erected was shattered to the ground. This terrible conqueror was Timur the Tartar, or as we call him "Tamerlane." Timur was of Turkish race, and was born near Samarkand in 1333. He was consequently an old man of nearly seventy when he came to encounter Bayezid in 1402. It had taken him many years to establish his authority over a portion of the numerous divisions into which the immense empire of Chingiz Khan had fallen after the death of that stupendous conqueror. Timur was but a petty chief among many others; but at last he won his way, and became ruler of Samarkand and the whole province of Transoxiana, or 'Beyond the River' (Mā-wān-nāh), as the Arabs called the country north of the Oxus. Once fairly established in this province, Timur began to overrun the surrounding lands, and during thirty years his ruthless armies spread over the provinces of Asia, from Delhi to Damascus, and from the Sea of Aral to the Persian Gulf. The subdivision of the Mohammedan Empire into numerous petty kingdoms rendered it powerless to meet the overwhelming hordes which Timur brought down from Central Asia. One and all, the kings and princes of Persia and Syria succumbed, and Timur carried his banners triumphantly as far as the frontier of Egypt, where the brave Mamlūk Sultans still dared to defy him. He had so far left Bayezid unmolested; partly because he was too powerful to be rashly provoked, and partly because Timur respected the sultan's valorous deeds against the Christians: for Timur, though a wholesale butcher, was very conscientious in matters of religion, and held that Bayezid's fighting for the Faith rightly covered a multitude of sins. Poole, Story of Turkey, p. 63.

Tinchebray, or Tinchebrai (tānsh-brā'), or Tinchebray, or Tinchebrai. A town in the department of Orne, Normandy, 44 miles northwest of Alençon. Here, Sept. 23, 1106, Henry I. of England defeated and captured his brother Robert, duke of Normandy. Population (1891), commune, 4,533.

Tindal (tin'dal), Matthew. Born at Beer-Ferrers, Devonshire, about 1656; died at Oxford, Aug. 16, 1733. An English deist. He studied at Lincoln College, Oxford. In 1685 he joined the Roman Catholic Church, but returned in 1688 to the Church of England. He published "An Essay of Obedience to the Supreme Powers" (1694) and "The Rights of the Christian Church asserted against the Romish and all other priests who claim an independent power over it" (1706-09). His defense of the theory of state control of the church led to the proscription of the work, Dec. 12, 1707. He continued to defend his deistic position, and in 1730 published "Christianity as old as the Creation, or the Gospel a Republication of the Religion of Nature," a work recognized as the "Bible" of deism. The work was translated into German by J. Lorenz Schmidt in 1741, and had great influence on German theology. Tindal called himself a "Christian deist."

Tindale, William. See Tyndale.

Ting-hai (ting-hi'), or Tinghae (ting-hi'). The capital of the island of Chusan, China.

Tingis. See Tangier.

Tingitana (tin-ji-tā'nā). An ancient Roman province, included in the northern part of the modern Morocco.

Tinné (tin'ne), Aléxandrine or Alexine. Born at The Hague, Oct. 17, 1839; murdered in the vicinity of Murzuk, Fezzan, Aug. 11, 1869. A Dutch traveler, of English descent. She traveled extensively in Europe and the East; with her mother, aunt, and others explored the White Nile to Gondokoro, and the regions of the Sobat and Bahr-el-Ghazal, 1862-64; traveled in 1865 and following years in southern Europe and northern Africa; and started for the interior of Africa in 1863, but was murdered by her escort.

Tinneh. See Athapascan.

Tinneveli (tin-e-vel'i), or Tinavelly (tin-avel'i). 1. A district in Madras, British India, intersected by lat. 9° N., long. 78° E. Area, 5,387 square miles. Population (1891), 1,916,095.—2. The capital of the district of Tinneveli, in lat. 8° 44' N. Population (1891), 24,768.

Tintagel (tin-tā'jel), or Trevena (tre-vē'nā). A village in Cornwall, near the sea, 18 miles west of Launceston. Near it is the ruined Tintagel Castle, celebrated in Arthurian legend. It was the reputed birthplace of Arthur. In the romance of Sir Tristan it is the castle of King Mark. Tintagel Head is a high cliff on the coast.

Tintern (tin'tēru) Abbey. A ruined medieval abbey in Monmouthshire, England, situated on the Wye 17 miles north by west of Bristol. The ivy-clad church, of the middle of the 13th century, is one of the most picturesque of English ruins. The vaulting is gone, but otherwise it is well preserved. It retains most of its window-tracery, and has a fine west portal of two cusped arches, and a single very large window, a typical English feature, in each of the main and transept façades. The monastic buildings survive in part.

Tinto (tin'tō), Dick. The light-hearted artist who is supposed to relate Scott's tale of "The Bride of Lammermoor" to Peter Mattieson. It is also the pseudonym of Frank Booth Goodrich.

Tinto Hills (tin'tō hilz). A group of hills in Lanarkshire, Scotland, southeast of Lanark. Height, about 2,300 feet.

Tintoretto (tēn-tō-ret'tō), or Tintoret (tin'tō-ret) (Jacopo Robusti; called Tintoretto from the trade of his father, a dyer). Born at Venice, Sept. 16, 1518; died there, May 31, 1594. A celebrated Venetian painter. He entered the atelier of Titian, with whom it does not appear that he stayed very long. From Titian he went to Andrea Schiavone. In 1546 he received his first important order for the decoration of the choir of Sta. Maria dell'Orto. The compositions were over 50 feet high. They brought him great reputation and a commission to paint the "Miracle of St. Mark," now in the Accademia delle Arti in Venice, his most perfect and important work. The "Last Supper," in the Sacristy of San Giorgio, is more powerful and vaster in technical range, but is less successful in its attainment of the finer qualities of art. In 1560 Tintoretto began to paint the Scuola di San Rocco and the doge's palace. The famous "Crucifixion" of the Scuola di San Rocco dates from this time. In 1576 he painted the ceiling of the great hall. In 1560 he seems to have taken the place of Titian as court painter to the doges. The great conflagrations of 1574 and 1577 threw much of the work of restoration into the hands of Tintoretto. The work accomplished by him on these commissions includes the great "Paradise" (1589-90).

Tiny Tim (tī'ni tim). The little crippled son of Bob Cratchit in Dickens's "Christmas Carol."

Tioga (ti-ō'gā). A small river in northern Pennsylvania and Steuben County, New York, which unites near Corning with the Conhoeton to form the Chemung.

Tionontati (tē'on-on-tā'tē). [Their own name, meaning 'there the mountain stands.']. A tribe of North American Indians who formerly lived in the mountains south of Nottawasaga Bay, Ontario. They were first met in 1616 by the French, who called them Nation du Petun, or Tobacco Nation, from their large fields of tobacco. On the defeat of the Hurons in 1648, many of the fugitives took refuge with the Tionontati, and the Iroquois attacked that tribe and drove them with the Hurons to the head of Lake Superior. In 1670 the united remnants lived at Mackinaw under the name of Wyandots. See Iroquoian.

Tiptapa (tē-pē-tā'pā). A river of Nicaragua, joining Lakes Managua and Nicaragua. Length, about 20 miles.

Tipkin (tip'kin), Biddy. A romantic character in Steele's "Tender Husband." She feels "that it looks so ordinary to go out at a door to be married." She is the original of Lydia Languish.

Tippecanoe (tip'e-ka-nō'). A nickname of William Henry Harrison, from his victory near the Tippecanoe River.

Tippecanoe, Battle of the. A victory gained at Battle Ground, Tippecanoe County, Indiana, near Tippecanoe River, Nov. 7, 1811, by the Americans under General William Henry Harrison over the Indians under the "Prophet," brother of Tecumseh.

He was minister of trade and agriculture 1879-82; minister of finance 1882-85; premier Dec., 1887-March, 1888, and Feb., 1889-March, 1890; and minister of finance 1892-93.

Tiraspol (tē-rās-poly'). A fortified town in the government of Kherson, Russia, situated on the Dniester 59 miles northwest of Odessa. Population (1887), 24,898.

Tiresias (ti-rē'si-as). [Gr. Τειρσηας.] In Greek legend, a blind Theban seer. He was said to have been blinded by Athene, whom he saw bathing. The goddess relented, but was unable to restore his sight, and so gave him instead the vision of the seer and understanding of the voices of birds and beasts (other accounts are given in the legends). At the request of Circe, Odysseus descended into Hades to consult him.

Tirhakah (tēr'ha-kā). A king of Egypt and Ethiopia who encountered Sennacherib while he was on his expedition against Judah (Isa. xxxvii. 9; 2 Ki. xix. 9). He was defeated by Sennacherib in the battle of Eltekeh (701 B. C.), and by his son and successor Esarhaddon (680-668 B. C.); the entire country was conquered by the Assyrian king, the names of the cities changed, and over the twenty principalities into which the country was divided were placed vassals loyal to Assyria. This took place after 673 B. C. But soon Tirhakah put to flight the Assyrian vassals and got possession of Memphis. Assurbanipal (668-626), in whose annals he is first mentioned by name (Tarku), defeated him in the battle of Karhanit (about 668). The twenty kings were restored, and Necho was put at their head. Soon afterward these twenty vassals entered into a plot with Tirhakah against Assyria. But the plot was discovered by the Assyrian garrison of Egypt, and frustrated. Tirhakah fled, and died in the place of his refuge. According to Manetho, Tirhakah (Tarkos, Tarakos) was the last of the Ethiopian kings in Egypt. The Egyptian monuments call this third and last king of the 25th "Ethiopian" dynasty Tahark or Taharka. He enlarged the temple of Amun in Thebes.

Tirlemont (tēr-lē-mōn'), Flem. Thienen (tē-nen). A town in the province of Brabant, Belgium, situated on the Geete 26 miles east of Brussels. It was taken by the Duke of Marlborough in 1705; and near it the French under Dumouriez defeated the Austrians March 16, 1795. Population, 16,157.

Tirnova (tēr'nō-vā), or Tarnovo (tār'nō-vō). A city in Bulgaria, situated on the Jantra in lat. 43° 6' N., long. 25° 36' E. It is an important strategic point on the route between the Danube and the Balkans; and was formerly the place of coronation of the Bulgarian kings. Alexander I. was chosen prince here and took the oath to the constitution in 1879. Population (1888), 11,314.

Tirso (tēr'sō). The principal river of the island of Sardinia; the ancient Thyrsus. It flows into the Gulf of Oristano near Oristano. Length, about 80 miles.

Tirso de Molina. The pseudonym of Tellez.

Tiruvalluvar (ti-rō-val-lō-vār'). [Properly Tiruvalluvar-nayanar, the sacred devotee, priest, or soothsayer of the Pariah.] The name given to the greatest of Tamil poets, the author of the Kural. His date is uncertain. Pope puts it between 800 and 1000 A. D. All that seems certain about the details of his life is that he lived at S. Thomé, or Mayilapur, now a suburb of Madras; was a weaver and a Pariah; and had an intimate friend, probably a patron, called Elakcinan, "Lion of the Surf," who was the captain of a small vessel, Kural, the name of his work, means "anything short," then the couplet, and thence this collection of couplets. It is divided into three books, treating of Virtue, Wealth, and Pleasure, and consists of 133 chapters, each containing 10 couplets, and so numbers 2,660 lines. The Venpa meter, in which it is composed, is very curious, and in fact unique. "A kural," says Pope, "is a couplet containing a complete and striking idea expressed in a refined and intricate meter. No translation can convey an idea of its charming effect. It is truly 'an apple of gold in a network of silver.'" Every Hindu sect claims the poet, and interprets his verses so as to favor its own dogmas, the Jains especially. He was influenced by Shankara's reforms, the later developments of Jainism, and the Bhagavadgita, his philosophy seeming to be of the eclectic school represented by the last.

Tiryns (ti'rinz). [Gr. Τίρυνς.] In ancient geography, a city of Argolis, Greece, situated near the coast southeast of Argos and 3 miles north of Nauplia. It was built on a rock, and is celebrated for its antiquities, including the Cyclopean walls, gates, and a palace (excavated by Schliemann and Dörpfeld 1881-85) of the 10th or 11th century B. C. The citadel is a famous memorial of the earliest known Greek civilization. The massive walls, built of great blocks with the interstices filled with small stones, surround the summit of an oblong hill. At one end are the well-known galleries of arcades resembling pointed arches; these were magazines for munitions and supplies. Within the walls there is an extensive prehistoric palace, with outer and inner courts, men's apartments, bath-room, and secluded women's quarters, the whole corresponding with the spirit of the Homeric picture. Wall-paintings and other details of high interest were found by Schliemann. According to the legend, Hercules lived for many years at Tiryns. It was destroyed by Argos about 468 B. C.

Tischendorf (tish'en-dorf), Lobegott Friedrich Konstantin von. Born at Lengsfeld, Saxony, Jan. 18, 1815; died at Leipsic, Dec. 7, 1874. A noted German Protestant biblical critic, professor at Leipsic from 1845. He was educated at Leipsic; made investigations in Paris, Holland, England, Italy, Egypt, Sinai, Palestine, and other parts of the East; and brought many manuscripts from the East, including the famous Sinaitic Codex of the New Testament. He published a critical edition of the New Testament (1872), various codices of the Old Testament and New Testament, "Anecdota sacra et profana," "Wann werden unsere Evangelien verfasst?" (1865), etc.

Tishri (tish'ri). [Assyr. tashritu, explained to mean 'beginning' (i. e. of the second half-year).] The seventh month of the Hebrew year, corresponding to September-October. In Tishri fall the holy days New Year's day, Atonement day, and Tabernacles.

Tisiphone (ti-sif'ō-nē). [Gr. Τισφώνη.] In Greek mythology, one of the Eumenides (which see).

Tissaphernes (tis-a-fēr'nēs). [Gr. Τισσαφέρνης.] Executed about 395 B. C. A Persian satrap. He became satrap in Asia Minor 414 B. C.; carried on war against the Athenians; was hostile to Cyrus the Younger, and discovered and disclosed the latter's plans to Artaxerxes II.; took part in the battle of Cunaxa 401 B. C.; pursued the Ten Thousand on part of their return journey and molested them; was appointed chief ruler in western Asia by Artaxerxes; was defeated by Agesilaus in 395; and was put to death through the influence of Parysatis.

Tissot (tē-sō'). James Joseph Jacques. Born at Nantes, Oct. 15, 1836; died at the Abbey of Bruillon, Doubs, France, Aug. 9, 1902. A noted French genre-painter. He at first painted after the Dutch school, but became the pupil of Flandrin and Lamotte. He painted (1863-96) a series of water-colors illustrating the life of Christ.

Tissot (tē-sō'). Simon (or Samuel) Auguste André David. Born at Grancy, Vaud, Switzerland, March 20, 1728; died at Lausanne, Switzerland, June 15, 1797. A physician of Lausanne. His best-known works are "L'Onanisme" (1760), "Avis au peuple sur la santé" (1761).

He was one of the founders in 1875 of the liberal party, which succeeded the Deak party, and was premier of Hungary 1875-90.

Titan (tī'tan). [Gr. Τίταν.] 1. See Titans.—

2. The sun personified, the name Titan being at times substituted by the Latin poets for Helios as god of the sun.—3. The sixth in order of the eight satellites of the planet Saturn, and the largest, appearing as a star of the ninth magnitude; discovered by Huygens March 25, 1655. See Saturn.

Titan. One of the principal romances of Jean Paul Richter, published in 1803.

Titania (ti-tā'nī-ä). A fairy queen in Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Shakespeare is said to be the first to give this name to the queen of the fairies.

Titania. The third satellite of Uranus, discovered by Lassell in 1847.

Titans (tī'tanz). [Gr. Τῑτῑνες, from Τῑτῑδες, children of Titan.] In Greek mythology, a race of primordial deities, children of Uranus and Gaia (Heaven and Earth). In the oldest accounts there were six male Titans (Oceanus, Coeus, Cruius, Hyperion, Iapetus, and Cronus), and six female (Theia, Rhea, Themis, Mnemosyne, Phoebe, and Tethys). They were imprisoned by their father Uranus from their birth, but, after unmaning and dethroning him, were delivered by Cronus. Zeus, son of Cronus, compelled him to disgorge his elder brothers and sisters, whom he had swallowed at their birth, and after a terrible war thrust the Titans (except Oceanus) into Tartarus, under guard of the hundred-armed giants. In the later legends, Titan, the father of the Titans, yielded the supreme power to his younger brother Cronus, but regained it, and was finally overcome by the thunderbolts of Zeus (Jupiter), son of Cronus (Saturn), who then became the supreme god. The Titans in their wars are said to have piled mountains upon mountains to scale heaven, and they were taken as the types of lawlessness, gigantic size, and enormous strength.

Titcomb (tī'tkōm), Timothy. The pseudonym of J. G. Holland.

Titheonus (ti-thō'nus). [Gr. Τῑθηονός.] In Greek mythology, a son (or brother) of Laomedon, beloved by Eos. He received from the gods the gift of immortality, but not of eternal youth, and in his extreme old age withered away and was metamorphosed into a grasshopper.

Titian (tish'an), It. Tiziano Vecelli (tēt-sē-ä'nō vā-chel'le) or Vecellio (vā-chel'le-ō); surnamed Da Cadore, and Il Divino ('The Divine'). Born at Pieve di Cadore, Friuli, 1477 (?); died at Venice, Aug. 27, 1576. A famous Venetian painter. He first studied painting at his native place, and at 9 or 10 years of age went to Venice and was put to study with Giovanni Bellini. He does not seem to have been influenced by any of the foreign schools. From 1507-08 he worked as collaborator with Giorgione in the decoration of the exterior of the Fondaco de Tedeschi at Venice; these frescos are destroyed. In 1511 Titian was at work at the school of Padua with Campagnola, who was his assistant. He returned to Venice in 1512, and in 1513 sought to obtain an order for a battle-piece for the council-hall, and applied for the first vacancy as broker at the Fondaco, a privilege already accorded to Bellini and Carpaccio. About this time he declined an invitation to work at Rome for the Pope. On the death of Bellini he became his successor as broker at the Fondaco and as portrait-painter to the dogs. In 1516 he went to Ferrara at the invitation of Alfonso d'Este, and painted several pictures, some of which are now in various public and private collections. From this time he was occupied with commissions from various royal and private clients until 1523, when he returned to Venice to paint the portrait of the new doge, Andrea Grillo, and the fresco over the landing of the doge's palace, "St. Christopher Carrying the Christ Child," which still remains. About this time he married, and in 1530 was left a widower with three children. In 1532 Titian was called to Bologna by Charles V., who had come to meet the Pope. He became painter to the emperor, and enjoyed his friendship. This relation led him in 1546 to Rome, where he met Michelangelo and became acquainted with the works of Raphael and the Greeks. He was at this time 69 years old. In 1547 he was summoned to Augsburg by the emperor, and there he painted many portraits. His court life was brilliant and profitable. In 1549 he was again at Venice, and in 1550 returned to Augsburg. His life from this time forward is a succession of honors and triumphs. He succeeded to the favor of Philip on the death of Charles V. He died of the plague. Among his chief paintings are many representations of the Magdalen, Venus, Danaë, the Madonna, the Holy Family, etc.; "Sacred and Profane Love" (Rome), "Bacchus and Ariadne" (London), "Ecce Homo" (Vienna), "Entombment of Christ" (Louvre), "Trifling Money" (Dresden), "Martyrdom of St. Laurence," "St. Peter Martyr," "Last Supper," "Christ Crowned with Thorns" (Louvre); "Bella di Tiziano" ("Titian's Mistress"; Palazzo Pitti, Florence, and another at The Hermitage, St. Petersburg); "Venus of the Tribune" (Uffizi, Florence), "L'Homme au Gant" (Louvre), "Knight of Malta" (Madrid), "Titian and his Mistress" (Louvre), etc.

Titicaca (tē-tē-kā'kā'). An island in Lake Titicaca, near the Peninsula of Copacabana. It was a sacred place of the Incas, the birthplace of the sun according to one of their legends, and by some said to be the place whence Manco Capac and his wife issued to found the empire at Cuzco. Ruins of a temple of the Sun, a palace, convent, etc., still exist on it. The lake itself probably took its name from this island.

Titicaca (tē-tē-kā'kā'), Lake. The largest and most important inland lake of South America, situated in a high basin between two ranges of the Andes, on the confines of Peru and Bolivia, 12,645 feet above the sea. It is irregular in form, and almost cut in two by the Peninsula of Copacabana. Near the eastern side it attains a depth of over 700 feet, but along the western and southern sides there are extensive shallows and marshes. The outlet is the Desaguadero, at the southern end. There are many small islands; some of these, as well as the Peninsula of Copacabana and many parts of the shore, have interesting ruins of the Incaic and pre-Incaic periods: the most celebrated of the latter are at Tiahuanaco (which see). The lake is connected with many legends of the Incas. The Indians still navigate Titicaca on rafts made of rushes; latterly small steamers have been placed on it. Ice sometimes forms along the shore. Extreme length, 101 miles. Average width, about 37 miles. Area, 3,200 square miles. See Titicaca Basin, below.

Titicaca Basin. An elevated inclosed plateau of the Andes of Bolivia, extending into Peru. It is about 600 miles long from north to south, 150 miles wide, and averages 13,000 feet above the sea. Much of the surface is unfit for agriculture, and the climate is so cold that corn will not grow. Lake Titicaca, near the northern end, discharges through the deep and rapid Desaguadero River, 100 miles long, into Lake Aullagas or Poopo. Beyond that the water is lost in sands and marshes. The northern part of the basin, and sometimes the whole of it, is called the Collao.

Titlis (tēt'lis). A mountain on the borders of Unterwalden, Bern, and Uri, Switzerland, 20 miles south by east of Lucerne. Height, 10,627 feet.

Titmarsh (tit'mārs), M. A. (or Michael Angelo). The name under which Thackeray wrote, in "Fraser's Magazine," his "Paris Sketch Book," "Yellowplush Memoirs," etc.

Titmouse (tit'mous), Tittlebat (tit'l-bat'). One of the principal characters in Warren's novel "Ten Thousand a Year": a vulgar shopman in Oxford street, London.

Titurel (tit'ū-rel). A hero of the legend of the Holy Grail, the subject of a series of poems by Wolfram von Eschenbach (generally called "Titurel" because the first begins with Titurel, the grandfather of Parzival), and of a "later Titurel" published in 1477.

Titus (tī'tus). A convert and companion of the apostle Paul.

Titus (Titus Flavius Sabinus Vespasianus). Born 40 or 41 A. D.; died Sept., 81. A Roman emperor, son of Vespasian; called "the delight of mankind." He was educated with Britannicus; served in the army; conducted the Jewish war after the departure of his father; and captured Jerusalem in 70. He was associated with Vespasian in the government, and succeeded to the throne June, 79. He finished the Colosseum, and built the "baths of Titus." An eruption of Vesuvius and a fire at Rome occurred in his reign.

Titus, Arch of. See Arch of Titus.

Titus Andronicus (tī'tus an-dron'i-kus or -nī-kus). A tragedy, produced in 1594, variously attributed to Marlowe, Kyd, and Shakespeare. It is published with Shakespeare's plays. Ravenscroft adapted it in 1678.

Titusville (tī'tus-vil). A city in Crawford County, Pennsylvania, situated on Oil Creek 81 miles north by east of Pittsburg; noted for the production and refining of petroleum, and the manufacture of oil-machinery. Petroleum was discovered there in 1859. Population (1900), 8,244.

Tityus (tī'ti-us). [Gr. Τῑτῑός.] In Greek mythology, the son of Zeus or of Gaia: a giant of Eubœa, father of Europa. He assailed Artemis or Leto at the instigation of Hera (Juno), and was killed by her arrows or those of Apollo, or by the lightning of Zeus. In Tartarus he was extended on the ground (covering nine acres) while vultures gnawed his liver.

Tiumen. See Tiumen.

Tiverton (tiv'ēr-ton). A borough in Devonshire, England, situated at the junction of the Lowman and Exe, 14 miles north of Exeter. It has manufactures of lace, and was formerly noted for its woollen manufactures. It was taken by Fairfax in 1645. Population (1891), 10,892.

Tivoli (tē'vō-lē). A town in the province of Rome, Italy, situated at the falls of the Tevere (the ancient Anio), 15 miles east-northeast of Rome; the ancient Tibur. The castle, erected by Pope Pius II. in the 15th century, is a highly picturesque fortress with five great cylindrical battlemented towers of different heights, connected by lofty multicolored curtain-walls. According to tradition, the town was founded by the Sienli. It was conquered by Rome about 335 B. C., and was the favorite place of residence of many Romans (Mecenas, Augustus, Hadrian, etc.). Among the antiquities on the site are Hadrian's Villa (which see), and the so-called temple of Vesta (perhaps the temple of the Tiburtine Sibyl). It is circular, with a cella surrounded by a peristyle of slender graceful Corinthian columns, rising from a simple basement. Ten columns, with their entablature, of the original eighteen are still standing. The diameter is 24 feet, the total height 341. The date is anterior to Augustus. Population (1881), 10,287.

Tizona (Sp. pron. tē-thō'nā). The sword of the Cid.

Tlaasah (tlā'as-āt), or Klaizaht (klā'iz-āt), or Makah (mā'k-ā'). A tribe of North American Indians. Their habitat was once on Vancouver Island, but they have occupied the region about Cape Flattery, Washington, since they have been known to history. Number (1884), 510. See Aht.

Tlacopan. See Tepanecas.

Tlaloc (tlä-lök'). In Aztec mythology, the god of rain. His cult was said to be older than any other, having come down from the Toltecs. According to Duran, his statue at Mexico "was of stone, formed in the shape of a terrible monster with an ugly face like that of a lizard." In seasons of drought it is said that children were sacrificed to Tlaloc. Also written Tlaloch.

Tlamath. See Klamath.

Tlamatl. See Klamath.

Tlaokuahit (tlä-ö'kwé-ät), or Clahoquahit (klä'hö-kwät). A tribe of North American Indians living on Clayoquah Sound, Vancouver Island, British Columbia. Number, 304. See Aht.

Tlascalala. See Tlaxcala.

Tlaxcala (ancient). See Tlaxcalans.

Tlaxcala (tläs-kä'lä). 1. A state of Mexico, surrounded by the states of Hidalgo, Puebla, and Mexico. Area, 1,506 square miles. Population (1895), 166,803. — 2. The capital of the state of Tlaxcala, situated on the Atoyac 64 miles east of Mexico. Population (1895), 2,874.

Tlaxcalans (tläs'kä-lanz), or Tlaxcaltecs (tläs-käl-tek's). A tribe of Mexican Indians, of the Nahuatlcan stock, who occupied the territory now included in the state of Tlaxcala, east of the valley of Mexico. They were less advanced in arts than the Aztecs; but they were brave warriors and had repeatedly defeated the Aztec armies, retaining their independence. They had elective chiefs, but the true governing power was the tribal council, called a senate by Spanish historians. Their principal pueblo was on or near the site now occupied by the city of Tlaxcala. Cortés, in his first march to Mexico, took the route through Tlaxcalan territory, and they resisted him in several fierce battles (Sept., 1519). Having been defeated, they made terms with the Spaniards, joined Cortés with a large force of warriors, and took a prominent part in the siege and capture of Mexico. The modern Indian population of Tlaxcala is mainly descended from this tribe. Also written Tlascalans, Tlaxcaltecos.

Tlinkit. See Koluschan.

Tmolus (mö'lus). [Gr. Τμῶλος.] A mountain-range in Asia Minor, extending eastward from near Smyrna, south of the Hermus and north of the Cayster.

Tobacco Nation. See Tionontati.

Tobago (tö-bä'gö), or Tabago (tä-bä'gö). An island of the British West Indies, northeast of Trinidad. Capital, Scarborough. Its northern point is in lat. 11° 21' N., long. 60° 31' W. The surface is mountainous. It was seen by Columbus in 1498, and was settled by the Dutch in 1654, but passed into the hands of the French and eventually (1763) of the English. In 1889 it was annexed to the colony of Trinidad. Length, 26 miles. Area, 114 square miles. Population (1892), 19,594.

Tobias (tö-bi'as). [Heb., 'God is good.'] The son of Tobit, and a character in the Book of Tobit.

Tobias, Family of, and the Angel. A fine painting by Rembrandt, in the Louvre, Paris.

Tobikhar (tö-bik-här'). A division of North American Indians, comprising a number of tribes which formerly lived about the missions of San Gabriel, San Luis Rey, San Juan Capistrano, San Fernando, Los Angeles, and San Bernardino, in southern California. The name, signifying 'residents, settlers,' belongs strictly to the former inhabitants of San Gabriel and Los Angeles, but is now used to designate also the entire group of tribes which form the southwestern or coast division of the Shoshonean stock. They have been gradually dispossessed of their lands, and are now mostly under the Mission agency, California, being classed, with natives of other tribes of totally distinct stocks, as "Mission Indians." Number, about 2,200. See Shoshonean.

Tobit (tö'bit), Book of. A romance, one of the apocryphal books of the Old Testament: so called from the name of its leading character.

Tobitschau (tö'bit-shou). A town in Moravia, Austria-Hungary, situated on the March 12 miles south of Olmütz. Here, July 15, 1866, a Prussian brigade defeated an Austrian force. Population (1890), commune, 2,632.

Tobol (tö-bol'). A river in western Siberia. It rises on the slopes of the Urals, and joins the Irtysh near Tobolsk. Length, about 600 miles. It is navigable for a large part of its course.

Tobolsk (tö-bolsk'). 1. A government of Western Siberia. Capital, Tobolsk. It is bounded by the Arctic Ocean on the north, the governments of Yeniseisk and Tomsk on the east, Semipalatinsk and Akmolinsk on the south, and European Russia on the west. di). The uncle of Tristram Shandy, in Sterne's novel of that name: one of its chief characters. See Le Fevre.

He represents, it has been said, the wisdom of love, as Mr. Shandy exemplifies the love of wisdom; more precisely, he is the incarnation of the sentimentalism of the eighteenth century. Leslie Stephen, Hours in a Library, III. 350.

Tocantins (tö-kän'tenz'). [So called from an Indian tribe.] An important river of central and northern Brazil. It rises in the state of Goyaz, flows northward, and reaches the Atlantic through the Pará River. The latter may be regarded as its estuary, though it also receives a large amount of water from the Amazon. The most important affluent of the Tocantins is the Araguaya. Navigation is interrupted by a series of rapids beginning about 200 miles above Pará; beyond these both the Tocantins and the Araguaya are navigable for many hundred miles. Length (from Pará), about 1,700 miles; with the Araguaya, nearly 1,900 miles.

Tocqueville (tok'vil; F. pron. tok-vél'), Alexis Charles Henri Clérel de. Born at Paris, July 29, 1805; died at Cannes, April 16, 1859. A celebrated French statesman and writer. His studies, begun at Metz, were completed by a course in law at Paris. He took his final degree in 1826, and spent then a year or more traveling in Italy and Sicily. On his return to France he occupied a post in the law-court of Versailles. But jurisprudence was not altogether suited to his tastes, and April 2, 1831, he left France for the United States, whither he was sent by his government for the purpose of studying the penitentiary system. He did not limit himself, however, to this special field, but extended his observations also to the social and political institutions and customs of the new country. The following year he published in France, together with his friend and traveling companion, M. de Beaumont, the result of their official investigations, under the title "Du système pénitentiaire aux Etats-Unis et de son application en France." This important work attracted much attention, and was crowned by the French Academy. From the notes that he had taken in a private capacity while on his visit to the United States, he wrote his masterpiece, "Democratie en Amérique" (1835-40). Its success secured his admission to the French Academy (Dec. 23, 1841). After several years of public life (1839-51), he retired in order to devote his entire time to travel and writing. Besides the works already mentioned, he wrote a number of pamphlets on various subjects, also an "Histoire philosophique du règne de Louis XV." (1846), and the first volume of the work left unfinished at his death, "L'Ancien régime et la révolution" (1856). A paper entitled "Etat social et politique de la France" was translated into English by John Stuart Mill, and published in the April number of the "Westminster Review," 1834. De Tocqueville's complete works were edited by his friend M. de Beaumont 1860-65.

Toledo (tö-le'dō; Sp. pron. tö-lä'thō). 1. A province of New Castile, Spain. It is bounded by Avila and Madrid on the north, Cuenca on the east, Ciudad Real and Badajoz on the south, and Caceres on the west. The surface is elevated and mountainous. Area, 5,886 square miles. Population (1887), 359,562.

2. The capital of the province of Toledo, situated on the Tagus in lat. 39° 51' N., long. 4° 1' W.; the ancient Toletum. It is picturesquely situated on hills; is the seat of an archbishop, primate of Spain; was long noted for manufactures, and is still famous for its swords; and has a trade in coal, iron, lumber, and grain. It formerly contained a university. The cathedral, the metropolitan church of Spain, was commenced in 1227, and is essentially of the 13th century, though it was not finished until 1492. Like most Spanish churches, it is not effective without. The five-aisled interior, though not lofty, is very impressive and picturesque; it has much good glass, and is a museum of sculpture and rich old church furniture. The choir-stalls are carved with the long series of victories of Ferdinand and Isabella over the Moors. The cloisters are large, with fine simple tracery and vaulting. The city contains many other churches and religious houses, and many specimens of Moorish architecture. The Alcázar is a combined palace and citadel rebuilt and decorated by Charles V., but greatly damaged by fire in 1886. The patio, or inner court, is a fine example of Renaissance arcading. The bridges of Alcantara and San Martín, over the Tagus, are both essentially of the 13th century, narrow, very lofty, and with an enormous central arch. The first has only one side arch, and a battlemented tower at the inner end and a simple gate at the outer; the second has four side arches, and a fortified tower at each end. The city was the ancient capital of the Carpetani, and was conquered by the Romans about 193 a. c. It was the capital of the West-Gothic realm; has been the seat of many councils; was the second city in the country under the Moorish rule; was taken by Alfonso VI. of Castile and Leon in 1085; was defended against Moorish attacks in the 12th century; and was the capital of Castile until superseded by Madrid in the 16th century. Population (1887), 20,837.

Tolstoi, Count Lyeff or Lyoff (i. e. Leo) Nikolaievich. Born in the government of Tula, Russia, Aug. 28, 1828 (O. S.). A Russian novelist, social reformer, and religious mystic. He was educated at the University of Kazan, and served in the army in the Caucasus and in the Crimean war, being appointed commander of a battery in 1855. He took part in the battle of the Tchernaya, was in the storming of Sebastopol, and after it was sent as a special courier to St. Petersburg. He retired at the end of the campaign. After the liberation of the serfs he lived on his estates, working with and relieving the peasants, and also devoting himself to study. The stories regarding his life have almost assumed the proportions of a myth. His chief novels are "War and Peace" (1859-68; a picture of Russian society 1805-15) and "Anna Karénina" (1875-78). Among his other works are "Sevastopol" (1852-55), "The Cossacks" (composed while in the army), "Ivan Hychik" (1880), "Two Pilgrims" ("Childhood, Boyhood, and Youth," 1885), "My Religion" (1885), "My Confession," "A Commentary on the Gospel," "Life," "The Kreutzer Sonata" (1890), and "War" (1892).

Toltecs (tōl'teks or tōl-taks'). A traditional or perhaps mythical race of Indians, said to have occupied the Mexican plateau during several centuries previous to the advent of the Aztecs. According to the story, they came from Inchtuclapallan, somewhere in the north, and after various migrations and temporary settlements arrived at Tollan (supposed to be Tula in Hidalgo). Here they settled in 661 (or 674), and a list is given of 9 or 11 "kings" who ruled them. The legends also connect them with the ruins at Teotihuacan, the pyramid at Cholula, etc.; and the prophet or hero Quetzalcoatl is said to have appeared in their cities, making his final departure from Tlapallan, an unknown locality, but supposed to be near the sea-coast. About 1013 the Toltec power was overthrown, and the nation journeyed southward and disappeared; but many have supposed that the Maya empire, which came into prominence about that time, originated with them. The vagueness and confusion which characterize all accounts of the Toltecs have given rise to many and widely diverse theories about them. Some ethnologists—notably Dr. Brinton—deny that they ever had any real existence except, perhaps, as an early and small gens of the Aztecs; others believe that they formed a powerful kingdom which left profound traces on the later civilizations.

All that we can gather about them with safety is that they were a sedentary Indian stock which at some remote time settled in portions of central Mexico, as for instance at Tula, Tullantzinco, Teotihuacan, and perhaps Cholula. Nothing certain is known of their language, and it must not be overlooked that the so-called Toltec names mentioned in the chronicles are in the Nahuatl idiom.

Baudelot, An Archeological Tour in Mexico, p. 191.

Toluca (tō-lō'kū). The capital of the state of Mexico, Mexico, 32 miles west-southwest of the city of Mexico. It is one of the places said to have been settled by the Toltecs, and was an important Aztec pueblo at the time of the Spanish conquest. Population (1895), 23,618.

Tordesilhas (tōr-dā-sē'l'ās), Sp. Tordesillas (tōr-dā-sē'l'yās), Convention of. A treaty between Spain and Portugal, signed at Tordesilhas June 7, 1494, regulating their rights of discovery and conquest. The Pope, by his celebrated bull of May 3, 1493, had drawn a meridian "100 leagues west of the Azores and Cape Verd Islands," giving to Spala the right of conquest to the west of it, and to Portugal the same right on the east. The convention of Tordesilhas removed this line to a meridian 370 leagues west of the Cape Verd Islands. At that time the continental character of America was unknown, and the powers supposed that they were dividing "the Indies," or Asia; but apparently it never occurred to them that, in pushing their conquests, they would eventually meet on the same meridian, but on the opposite side of the world. Unfortunately the meridian was not definitely fixed—first, because it was reckoned from an archipelago, and not from one island or point; and second, because the term "league" admitted of several different meanings. The Brazilian coast, discovered soon after, was clearly to the east of the Tordesilhas line, and it was accordingly settled by the Portuguese; but the line passed near the mouths of the two great rivers Plata and Amazon, and in the uncertainty as to its position disputes arose in those regions which have come down to the present day. Eventually, and partly because of the uncertainty, the Portuguese pushed their conquests far westward. In the course of time the two powers met in the East Indies, and here the field of dispute was broader, owing to the defective methods of determining longitude which were then in vogue. The Philippine Islands, discovered by Magellan, were claimed and held by Spain as lying within her hemisphere; but in fact they were in the hemisphere which had been assigned to Portugal.

Toreno (tō-rā'nō), José Maria, Count of Toreno. Born at Oviedo, Spain, 1786; died at Paris, Sept. 16, 1843. A Spanish historian and politician, minister in the regency of Maria Christina. Toussaint, Anna Luize Geertruide. See Bosboom.

Toussaint Louverture or L'Ouverture (tō-san' lō-ver-tūr'), Dominique François. Born near Cap François, Haiti, 1743; died at the Castle of Joux, near Pontarlier, France, April 27, 1803. A Haitian revolutionist. He was a negro slave, but received a rudimentary education. In 1791, after protecting the flight of his master, he joined Jean François, with whom he subsequently fought for the royalist faction, at that time united with the Spanish Dominicans. In 1794, with a large force of blacks, he deserted to the French republicans, thus turning the scale in their favor and acquiring unbounded influence for himself. He was made deputy governor and commander-in-chief; and eventually the French commissioners, who were supposed to rule the island, were left with only nominal power. When the British under General Maitland evacuated the island in 1798, they refused to treat with Commissioner Hédoüville, but surrendered the posts which they had held to Toussaint as the real ruler. Soon after an insurrection, incited by Toussaint, drove Hédoüville from the island: he delegated his powers to the mulatto general Rigaud, but in 1799 Rigaud was defeated by Toussaint, who thus became undisputed master of the western part of the island. He issued a general amnesty, protected the whites, and put the blacks at work on their old plantations under a compulsory system which, however, secured them a part of the profits. In 1801 he occupied the eastern part of the island, which had been ceded to France. Finally he threw off all semblance of subjection to France, pronouncing a constitution which made him president for life, with power of nominating his successor (July, 1801). Bonaparte thereupon sent General Leclerc with a formidable force to subdue the island (see Leclerc). After a series of bloody conflicts Toussaint capitulated, and was pardoned (May 1, 1802). The next month he was arrested on a charge of conspiracy and sent to France, where he remained a prisoner until his death.

Tower Hill. A hill in London, near the Tower, formerly the scene of execution of political offenders.

Tower of London. The ancient palace-citadel of London. It is situated on the Thames at the southeast angle of the old walled city of London. The Roman wall ran through the site. It consists of a large and irregular agglomeration of buildings of different periods, inclosed within battlemented and moated walls. While a stronghold of some kind existed earlier on the site, the history of the Tower begins with William the Conqueror. The chief buildings are the work of Norman kings and Henry III. No important additions were made after Edward I. When it ceased to be a royal residence it became famous as a state prison, and is now a national arsenal. The royal mint was located there in the middle ages. The Tower has four gates—the Iron, Water, and Traitors' Gates on the side toward the Thames, and the Lions' Gate at the southwest angle. In the middle of the inclosure rises the square and lofty White Tower, the keep of the medieval fortress. It is characterized by its four tall angle-turrets with modern crowning. In the White Tower is the venerable Chapel of St. John, with heavy cylindrical pillars, round arches, and rude capitals; it is unsurpassed as an example of the earliest type of Norman architecture. In the halls above is shown an admirable collection of mediæval arms and armor. The buildings of the inner inclosure include 12 towers, with many of which are associated memories of historic captives, executions, and crimes. In the Record or Wakefield Tower are kept the crown jewels of England. In the Chapel of St. Peter ad Vincula, in the northwest angle, and the little cemetery adjoining, are buried most of the celebrated persons who suffered death within the Tower precincts or on Tower Hill. The buildings are for the most part severely plain, in rough masonry of small stones, their great interest lying almost wholly in their manifold associations.

Tower of the Winds. The horologium or water-clock erected by the Syrian Andronieus Cyrresthes, at Athens, in the 1st century B. C. It is octagonal in plan, 26 feet in diameter, and 42 high. Toward the top of each face is sculptured the figure of a Wind with appropriate attributes. The structure was surmounted by a bronze Triton which served as a weather-vane.

In connection with it are Balliol House and Wadham House. It was organized and named in memory of Arnold Toynbee (1852-83), a graduate of Oxford, who devoted himself to work among the poor in Whitechapel and died of overstrain, and from whose example sprang the idea of such a residence house.

Trachenberg (trä'chen-berg). A small town in the province of Silesia, Prussia, situated on an arm of the Bartsch 26 miles north by west of Breslau. Here, July, 1813, plans for the campaign were signed by the czar Alexander I. and Frederick William III.

Trachiniae (tra-kin'i-ē). [Gr. Τραχίνας, Women of Trachis.] A play by Sophocles, founded on the death of Hercules at Trachis.

The play called the "Trachiniae," or "Women of Trachis," because these form the chorus, tells how Deianira, living at Trachis in Thessaly, learns that Hercules has fallen in love with Iole, and sends him a robe anointed with the blood of the Centaur Nessus, knowing not that it is aught but a harmless love-charm; and how Hercules, in mortal torment from the poison, bids his son Hyllus take him to the top of Mount Eta, and lay him on a funeral pyre; and thence, "wrapped in heavenly flame, is gathered to the host of the gods." Jebb, Greek Lit., p. 85.

Trachis (trä'kis). [Gr. Τραχίς.] In ancient geography, a city of Greece, situated at the foot of Mount Eta near Thermopylae. It was an important strategic point, and the legendary scene of the death of Hercules. The Spartan colony of Ileraclia was established there in 426 B. C.

Tractarians. See Oxford School.

Tractatus Theologico-politicus. See Spinoza.

Tract No. 90. See Tracts for the Times.

Tracts for the Times, or Oxford Tracts. A series of 90 pamphlets, published at Oxford from 1833 to 1841, the doctrines of which formed the basis of the Tractarian movement. The movement began as a counter-movement to the liberalizing tendency in ecclesiasticism and the rationalizing tendency in theology, and was in its first inception an endeavor to bring the church back to the principles of primitive and patristic Christianity. Its fundamental principles were that the Christian religion involves certain well-defined theological dogmas, and a visible church with sacraments and rites and definite religious teaching on the foundation of dogma, and that this visible church is based upon and involves an unbroken line of episcopal succession from the apostles, and includes the Anglican Church. The tracts consisted of extracts from the High-church divines of the 17th century and the church fathers, with contributions by Newman, Froude, Pusey, and Isaac Williams. In the last of the series, Tract No. 90, Dr. (afterward Cardinal) Newman took the ground that the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England are in large part susceptible of an interpretation not inconsistent with the doctrines of the Council of Trent. This tract was condemned by a number of bishops and heads of colleges, and a part of the Tractarians (among them Newman in 1845) entered the Church of Rome, others remaining with Dr. Pusey and John Keble in the Church of England, and maintaining the principles of sacramental efficacy and apostolic authority within that communion.

Treveri (trev'e-ri), or Treviri. In ancient history, a Celtic (or Germanic?) people in eastern Gaul, who dwelt near the Moselle. Their chief town was Treves (which was named from them).

But, if we admit the witness of Jerome as to the Celtic speech of the Treveri, it follows that we must admit their Celtic descent. During the times between Cæsar's day and Jerome's, the Treveri might have exchanged either German or Gaulish for Latin; they were not at all likely to exchange German for Gaulish. In the face of such witness as this, it is hardly safe for German writers to assume, as they sometimes do, without doubt or qualification, that the Treveri were a German people.

Fremant, Hist. Essays, III. 74.

Treves (trēvz), F. Trèves (trāv), G. Trier (trēr). It contains more Roman antiquities than any other city in northern Europe (see below). Its cathedral is one of the oldest of German churches, occupying the site of a 4th-century basilica built by Valentinian I., some portions of which are incorporated in the existing structure. In the 11th century an addition was made at the west end with an apse, and the eastern apse was built a century later. The vaulting is of the 13th century. The different styles of masonry and ornament are plainly distinguishable on the exterior. The interior possesses a fine Renaissance pulpit, choir-screen, and high altar, and beautiful monuments. It contains the famous seamless or "Holy Coat" said to have been worn by Jesus Christ. According to the legend, the empress Helena brought it to Treves in 316. About 1512 it became a fruitful source of revenue. Its last exhibitions were in 1814 and 1891. It attracted over a million and a half pilgrims. Treves contains a Roman basilica, assigned to the reign of Constantine; one of the special class of Roman monuments intended for the administration of justice and the convenience of trade. The monument has been put to various uses since the Roman day, and is now a Protestant Church. It is built entirely of brick, in the form of a rectangular hall with a large semicircular apse at the north end. The Porta Nigra is another memorial of the old Roman city, consisting of a fortified gate flanked by two towers. It is assigned to the 4th century, and has its name from the black hue acquired by its masonry from age. It has two gateways, 23 feet high, and consists of three stories. It measures 115 by 29 feet, and the towers are 93 feet high. There is a Roman amphitheater, assigned to the time of Trajan or Hadrian, and in excellent preservation. On one side the structure is supported against a side hill; on the other it is built up architecturally. At the north and south ends there are triple gateways, the central passage leading to the arena, and those at the sides giving access to the auditorium. There are two other entrances for spectators on the west side. The axes of the elliptical plan are 228 and 159 feet, and the auditorium could receive about 30,000 people. There are also Roman baths, after those of Badenweiler the best-preserved structure of this class north of Italy, dating from the 4th century. A. is, and lately excavated. The length of the chief façade is 60 feet; the disposition of the cold bath (frigidarium), warm bath (tepidarium), hot-air bath (caldarium), heating devices (hypocaustum), etc., is still clear. Treves, founded perhaps by the emperor Claudius, was one of the most important provincial cities under the Roman Empire, of which it was the western capital. It was taken by the Franks about 484; had great importance in the middle ages as the capital of the archbishopric of Treves; passed to France in 1791, and became the capital of the department of Sarre; and passed to Prussia in 1815. Population (1890), 36,160.

Treves, F. Trèves, G. Trier, Electorate of. An electorate and archbishopric of the old German Empire. It lay chiefly west of the Rhine, but a part lay east, opposite Coblenz. The bishopric of Treves, the oldest in Germany, was erected into an archbishopric in the 9th century. The archbishop was recognized as one of the seven electors in 1356. The part on the left of the Rhine was annexed by France in 1797. Treves was secularized in 1801, and the part east of the Rhine was given to Nassau. Nearly all of the electorate was assigned to Prussia 1-15.

Trilby (tril'bi). A novel by George Du Maurier, published in 1894. It deals with artist life in the Quartier Latin in Paris. It has been dramatized. Trilby O'Ferrall, the heroine, is by occupation a laundress and also a model "for the altogether" in the artists' quarter. She is gay, generous, and friendly,—has, in short, all the virtues save one,—and is famous for the possession of the most beautiful foot in Paris. Her comradeship with the three artists,—Taffy, the Laird (a Scotchman), and Little Billee,—who all love her more or less, forms the theme of the story. Svengali, a Polish Jew and a musical genius, gains control of her hypnotically, and by means of this power develops her voice, and transforms her into a celebrated prima donna.

Trimountain (tri'moun'tān), or Tremont (tremont'). An early name of Boston. See Boston.

Trimurti (tri-mōr'ti). [In Skt., 'having three forms,' and then at the beginning of a compound a collective designation of Brahma, Vishnu, and Shiva.] The Hindu triad, consisting of these gods, associated in a threefold impersonation of the Supreme Spirit. Brahma is the creator, Vishnu the preserver, and Shiva the destroyer. Brahma should strictly be the first of three equal persons, but ordinarily either Shiva or Vishnu is identified with the Supreme Being, and the other two, especially Brahma, are reduced to a subordinate part. Although there are traces of a triadic principle in the earlier literature, as in the triad of Agni, Vayu or Indra, and Surya, the doctrine of the Trimurti is a development of the later Puranic theology, and rather a philosophical conception than an important article of popular belief. Its significance has been much exaggerated. These gods are creations of the Supreme Spirit, rather than the Supreme Spirit himself. They are composed of material particles, and are subject to destruction and reabsorption. The points of difference from are quite as noticeable as the points of resemblance to the Christian doctrine of the Trinity.

Trinacria (tri-nā'kri-ā). [Gr. Τρινακρία.] An old name of Sicily, from the three promontories Pachynum, Pelorum, and Lilybæum.

Trincalo (trin'ka-lō), or Trinculo (trin'kū-lō). The principal character in Tomkiss's "Albumarzar": a farmer.

Trincomali (tring'kō-mā-lē'). A seaport in Ceylon, situated on the northeastern coast in lat. 8° 33' N., long. 81° 14' E. It has a fine harbor, and is one of the chief British naval stations in Asia. It was finally taken by the British from the Dutch in 1795. Population (1891), 11,411.

Trinculo (trin'kū-lō). A jester, a character in the "Tempest" by Shakspeare.

Trinidad (trin-i-dad'; Sp. pron. trē-nē-triñā'n'). [Sp., 'Trinity.' Columbus is said to have given the name to the island on account of three prominent peaks near the shore where he first saw it.] An island of the British West Indies, forming with Tobago a crown colony, situated northeast of Venezuela, near the coast, and opposite the northern mouths of the Orinoco. Capital, Port of Spain. The surface is varied, portions being mountainous. The chief exports are sugar, cocoa, molasses, coffee, and asphalt (from the celebrated pitch lake of La Brea). It was discovered by Columbus in 1498; and was taken by the British from the Spanish in 1797. Length, about 80 miles. Area, 1,754 square miles. Population (1892), 210,541.

Trinity Bay. A large bay on the eastern side of Newfoundland, deeply indenting the coast, and nearly cutting off the peninsula of Avalon.

Trinity Church. 1. A notable church (Episcopalian) at Boston, Massachusetts, designed by H. H. Richardson, founded in 1873, and consecrated in 1877. The building is cruciform, 160 by 120 feet, in the Romanesque style of Auvergne, the masonry exhibiting inlaid patterns in stone of different colors. The transepts have triple windows, and the front, with its graceful arcaded loggia, is flanked by towers. The chief feature of the church is the imposing central tower, which has square openings below and arcades above, with cylindrical turrets at the angles, and a pyramidal tiled roof 211 feet high, broken by picturesque dormers. The interior is ornamented with mural paintings by John La Farge and other artists. 2. One of the oldest religious foundations (Episcopalian) in New York city, though the present building dates only from 1846. It is an example in brown stone of the English Perpendicular style, with square chevets, without transepts, and with an effective tower and spire, 284 feet high, at the east end, which is the front. The richly sculptured reredos and the bronze doors are artistically notable.

Trinity College. The largest college of Cambridge University, England, founded by Henry VIII. in 1546 by the union of several older foundations. The beautiful gateway on the street is mainly of the time of Henry VIII. The great court, 340 by 230 feet, is bounded on the north by the chapel and on the west by the hall. The chapel is of the Tudor period, with fine wood-carving and portrait-sculptures. The cloister court is arcaded on three sides, and on the fourth is bounded by the handsome classical library built by Wren. There are several other comparatively modern courts.

Trinity College. A college of Oxford University, founded by Sir Thomas Pope in 1554 upon the site of an old college of the priors of Durham which had been founded in 1286. The Renaissance chapel, built in 1694, has a plain exterior with large round-arched windows, and possesses a fine altarpiece and a beautiful carved screen.

Trinity College, or The University of Dublin. The leading educational institution in Ireland, founded by Queen Elizabeth in 1591. The chief front, toward College Green, is ornamented with Corinthian columns and pilasters and a pediment. The extensive buildings inclose several quadrangles or "squares." The chapel has a Corinthian portico; the decorations of the fine library are also Corinthian. The campanile, which stands alone, is a circular domed Corinthian belvedere, surmounted by a lantern, and resting on a rusticated basement pierced by arches.

Trinity College. An institution of learning at Hartford, Connecticut. It was opened in 1824, and was known as Washington College until 1845. It is under Episcopal control. It has about 150 students and a library of 40,000 volumes.

Trinity Hall. A college of Cambridge University, England, founded in 1350, and occupied chiefly by students of law.

Trinity House, Corporation of. An English corporation, first chartered in 1514, charged with various naval matters, especially with erecting lighthouses, etc.

Trinity River. 1. A tributary of the Klamath River in northwestern California. Length, over 100 miles.—2. A river in Texas, formed by the union of the West Fork and Elm Fork, and flowing into Galveston Bay. Length, over 500 miles; navigable about half its length.

Tringitāt (tring-ki-tāt'). A port on the Red Sea, about 33 miles southeast of Tekar; an important strategic point in the Sudanese campaign of 1884.

Trinkat, Battle of. See Tokar.

Trinobantes (trin-ō-ban'tēz). See the extract.

The Trinobantes, another Belgian tribe, had settled in such parts of the modern Middlesex and Essex as were not covered by the oak forests or overflowed by the sea. Their western boundary may be fixed in the Valley of the Lea and along the edge of the "Forest of Middlesex," which once spread northwards from the swamp at Finsbury and covered the Weald of Essex. Their northern limit was fixed at the Valley of the Stour, a flat and marshy tract which is thought to have been covered at that time by the sea for a distance of many miles above the termination of the modern estuary. Elton, Origins of Eng. Hist., p. 105.

Trinumus (tri-num'us). A comedy by Plautus.

Triomphe, Arc de. See Arc de Triomphe.

Tripartite Chronicle. A Latin historical poem by Gower.

Tripitaka (tri-pi'ta-ka). [In Pali Tipitaka, the Three Baskets.] A collective name for the three classes into which the sacred writings of the Southern Buddhists are divided, viz. the Sutrapitaka (Pali Suttapitaka), 'Aphorisms,' 'Discourses for the Laity'; Vinayapitaka, 'Discipline for the Order'; and Abhidhammapitaka (Pali Abhidhammapitaka), 'Metaphysics.' The term "basket" was applied to these divisions because the palm-leaves on which they were written were kept in baskets. A list in detail of the several treatises included in each of these divisions may be found in Rhys Davids's "Buddhism" (London, 1886), pp. 18-21. Discussing the question of their enormous mass, Davids finds that, exclusive of the very frequent repetitions, they contain rather less than twice as many words as the Bible, and that a translation of them into English would be about four times as long.

Triple Alliance. 1. A league between England, Sweden, and the Netherlands, formed in 1668, and designed to check the French aggressions.—2. A league between France, Great Britain, and the Netherlands, formed in 1717, and directed chiefly against Spain. After the accession to it of Austria in 1718, it was known as the Quadruple Alliance.—3. An alliance between Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Italy, formed in 1882, and designed to check Russia and also France. It is chiefly the creation of Prince Bismarck. By its provisions the three powers are bound to support one another in certain contingencies. Its influence has succeeded to that of the League of the Three Emperors (the German, Austrian, and Russian), which was also largely the creation of Bismarck. It was renewed in June, 1902.

Triple Alliance, War of the, or Paraguayan War. The war waged, 1865-70, between Paraguay on one side and Brazil, the Argentine Republic, and Uruguay on the other. In 1864-65 Brazil had a short war with Uruguay which ended in the downfall of the government of the latter country, Flores assuming the presidency. Lopez, president of Paraguay, protested against the interference of Brazil in the affairs of Uruguay, and commenced the war by seizing a Brazilian passenger steamer at Asuncion (Nov., 1864) and invading Mato Grosso (Dec.-Jan., 1864-65). Early in 1865 he sent a force across Argentine territory against the Brazilian province of Rio Grande do Sul; subsequently he seized Argentine merchantmen, and on April 14, 1865, occupied Corrientes, taking two Argentine war vessels. On June 11 the Paraguayan flotilla was nearly annihilated in a combat with the Brazilian squadron at Riachuelo, below Corrientes. The Argentine Republic declared war on Paraguay April 6; and on May 1 the triple offensive and defensive alliance between Brazil, the Argentine, and Uruguay was signed at Buenos Ayres. The Emperor of Brazil and Presidents Mitre and Flores took personal part in the campaign in Rio Grande do Sul; the Paraguayans who had invaded that province were besieged in Uruguayana, and surrendered (6,000 men) Sept. 18, 1865. On Oct. 25 Corrientes was occupied by the allies, who, after some fighting, crossed the Paraná into Paraguay, April, 1866. The most important of the subsequent operations were near the river Paraguay, and especially at Humaitá and Curupaity, where Lopez had strong fortifications. The principal events were: Paraguayans defeated at Estero Bellaco (May 2, 1866) and Tuyutí (May 24); Boqueron taken, July 16; allies repulsed at Sauce, July 18; Curuzú bombarded Sept. 1, taken by assault Sept. 3 (the Brazilian ironclad Rio de Janeiro was sunk by a torpedo Sept. 2); allies repulsed at Curupaity, Sept. 22; second battle of Tuyutí, Nov. 3, 1867; passage of Humaitá by the allied fleet, Feb. 19, 1868; Brazilians repulsed at Humaitá, July 16; Paraguayans abandoned Humaitá, July 25; repulsed at Piskiry, Sept. 23; battles near Villeta, Dec. 6 and 11; Villeta occupied by the allies, Dec. 11; battles on Dec. 21, 22, and 27, ending in the surrender of Angostura Dec. 30; allies entered Asuncion, Jan. 1, 1869. Subsequently there were numerous combats, generally adverse to the Paraguayans. Lopez was forced into the northern part of Paraguay, and was defeated and killed at the Aquidaban. A small Brazilian army had operated in Mato Grosso, but its movements, from a military point of view, were unimportant. The allies were commanded successively by Mitre, Lhaça e Silva, and the Count d'Eu.

Tripoli (trip'ô-li). A vilayet of the Turkish empire, situated along the coast of northern Africa, about long. 9°-25° E., bounded by Tunis on the northwest and by the desert on the west and south. It contains the oasis of Fezzan and other oases, and has a narrow fertile belt near the coast. The capital is Tripoli. The inhabitants are Moors, Kabyles, Arabs, Turks, etc. It was anciently a possession of Carthage, and later of Rome; was conquered by the Arabs in the 7th century, and by the Turks in the middle of the 10th century; became a seat of Barbary pirates; secured its independence in 1714; and was reconquered by Turkey in 1835. Population, 804,000.

Tripoli. [Gr. Τριπολις, name of several places regarded as including 'three cities.'] A seaport, the capital of Tripoli, in lat. 32° 54' N., long. 13° 11' E. It has some foreign trade, and is the starting-point of caravans for the interior. It was formerly a piratical stronghold, and several times has been bombarded. Population (estimated), 20,000-30,000.

Tripoli, or Tripolis (trip'ô-lis), or Tarabulus (tā-rā' bā-lōs). A town in Syria, Asiatic Turkey, situated on the river Abu-Ali (Kadisha), near its mouth, in lat. 34° 27' N., long. 35° 49' E. It has considerable trade, fisheries, and manufactures of silk; its neighboring seaport is Al-Mina. Tripoli was an ancient Phœnician city; was taken by the Saracens about 639; was besieged by the Crusaders in 1104, and taken in 1109; and was destroyed in 1289, but rebuilt. Its castle is a large structure with crenelated walls and nichelated towers. Its halls, courts, arcades, and rock-cut passages and cascades are of great interest. Pop., 17,000.

Tripolitan War. A war between the United States and Tripoli, 1801-05. War was declared by Tripoli June 10, 1801, because the United States refused to increase its payment for immunity from the depredations of the Tripolitan corsairs. In anticipation of this event, however, the United States had already sent a squadron to the Mediterranean. In Oct., 1803, the frigate Philadelphia, Captain Bainbridge, while chasing a corsair into the harbor of Tripoli, struck a sunken rock and was captured by the Tripolitans; she was burned by Decatur Feb. 16, 1804. In July, 1804, Commodore Edward Preble began a series of only partially successful attacks on the harbor fortifications, the fifth and last of which was made in the following September. In the meantime a land expedition under William Eaton induced Tripoli to conclude peace June 4, 1805 (see Eaton, William).

Tripolitza (trō-pō-lit'sā), or Tripolis. The capital of the nomarchy of Arcadia, Greece, in lat. 37° 30' N., near the ancient Mantinea and Tegea. It became the capital of the pashalic of Morea in 1718; was stormed by the Greeks Oct. 17, 1821; and was retaken by Ibrahim Pasha June 22, 1825, and ruined. Population (1880), 10,057.

Trip to Calais, A. A play by Foote, in which, under the name of Lady Kitty Crocodile, he undertook to ridicule the notorious Duchess of Kingston. She secured the prohibition of the play, and he altered it and produced it as "The Capuchin"; but his health broke down under an indictment for criminal assault, procured by a creature of the duchess, and he died not long after.

Triptolemus (trip-tol'e-mus). [Gr. Τριπτόλεμος.] In Greek mythology, a favorite of Demeter; the inventor of the plow and patron of agriculture. He was honored in the Eleusinian mysteries.

Trip to Scarborough, A. An alteration by Sheridan of Vanbrugh's "Relapse," produced in 1777.

Trismegistus. See Hermes.

Trissino (trēs-sō'nō), Giovanni Giorgio. Born at Vicenza, Italy, July 8, 1478; died in Dec., 1550. An Italian lyric, epic, and dramatic poet and scholar. See the extract.

Gian-Giorgio Trissino had, in fact, sufficient merit to justify that celebrity which, during a whole century, placed his name in the first rank in Italy. Born at Vicenza in 1475, of an illustrious family, he was equally qualified by his education for letters and for public business. He came to Rome when he was twenty-four years of age, and had resided there a considerable time when Pope Leo X., struck by his talents, sent him as his ambassador to the Emperor Maximilian. Under the pontificate of Clement VII. he was also charged with embassies to Charles V. and to the Republic of Venice, and was decorated by the former with the order of the Golden Fleece. In the midst of public affairs he cultivated, with ardor, poetry and the languages. He was rich; and, possessing a fine taste in architecture, he employed Palladio to erect a country house, in the best style, at Criccoli. Domestic vexations, and more particularly a lawsuit with his own son, embittered his latter days. He died in 1550, aged seventy-two. The most just title to fame possessed by Trissino is founded on his "Sofonisba," which may be considered as the first regular tragedy since the revival of letters.

Simoulli, Lit. of the South of Europe, 1, 408.

Trissotin (trēs-sō-tān'). A "pédant" in Molière's "Les femmes savantes," which intended to ridicule the Abbé Cotin.

Tristan (tris'tān). A prose Breton or Cornish romance. The first part was written or translated about 1170 by a Norman knight, Luces de Gast, who lived near Salisbury in the time of Henry II. The second part was written by Hélie de Borron, who connected Tristan ("Tristan" in the Old English form) with the Round Table romances. The name appears in many forms, as Tristan, Tristans, Tristanz, Tristant, Tristan, Tristranz, Tristrant, Trystren, Tristram, Tristrem, Trystrem, Trastram, Tritan, Tritans, Tritanz, and was associated with the Latin tristis, sorrowful.

The story of Tristan seems to have been current from the earliest times. It was the subject of a number of metrical tales in the Romance language, which were versified by the French minstrels from ancient British authorities. From these original documents, or from the French metrical tales, was compiled the Sir Tristram attributed to Thomas of Bretonne, and which has been edited by Mr. [Sir Walter] Scott. There are also extant two fragments of metrical versions, which are supposed to be parts of one whole work, written by Raoul de Beauvais, who lived in the middle of the thirteenth century.

Dunlop, Hist. of Prose Fiction, 1, 103.

Tristan da Cunha (tris-tān' dā kūn'yā). A group of three islands and two islets in the South Atlantic, in lat. 37° 3' S., long. 12° 18' W. They are of volcanic formation. The group includes Tristan, Inaccessible, and Nightingale. They were discovered by the Portuguese in 1506, and were taken possession of by Great Britain in 1816. Highest peak, about 5,500 feet. Population (1893), 52.

Tristan l'Ermite (trēs-ton' ler-mēt'). The provost of Louis XI. of France, infamous for his cruelty.

Tristan und Isolde (tris'tān ūnt ē-zōl'de). 1. An epic poem by Eilhard von Oberg, written in the last half of the 12th century. He introduced this romance to German literature.—2. A famous epic poem by Gottfried von Strassburg, written in the 12th century, but later than Eilhard's poem. This is the classical form of the story. It was left unfinished, and sequels were written by two later poets, the last in 1390. It was closely connected with the English "Sir Tristram" and with a Northern saga.

3. An opera, both words and music by Wagner, first produced at Munich in 1865.

Tristram, or Tristrem. See Tristan.

Tristram (tris'tram), Sir, of Lyonesse. [From L. tristis, sorrowful.] One of the most celebrated knights of the Round Table. His love for Isolde, or Iseult, the wife of King Mark, forms the subject of many romances. He was born in the open country, where his mother, who died shortly after, was in great sorrow; hence she gave him this name. See Tristan.

Tristram Shandy (tris'tram shan'di). A famous novel by Sterne (9 vols. 1760-67); so called from its nominal hero. The first volume introduces Walter Shandy and his brother the Captain (Uncle Toby), Slop, and Yorick. Corporal Trim is prominent in the second volume; the third and fourth contain a good deal on the subject of noses and Slawkenbergius; the sixth contains the episode of Le Fevre; and the Widow Wadman is introduced in the eighth. The character of Walter Shandy, Tristram's father, an opinionated, captious old gentleman, is taken from that of Arbuthnot's Martin Scribblers the elder.

Trita (tri-tā'). A Vedic god appearing in connection with the Maruts, Vata or Vayu, and Indra, and to whom, as to them, combats with demons, such as Tvashtra, Vritra, and the dragon, are ascribed. He is called Aptya, a word perhaps related to ap, 'water,' and thought of as living concealed and very far away when his are wished to Trita. Related to Trita is Traitana, the name of a superhuman being or designation of a god. With Aptya is compared the Avestan Athrya, inhabitant of the waters, the name of a family whence descended Yima and in modern Persian Atbin or Abtin, the name of the father of Faridun; with Traitana, Avestan Thraetaona (which see), modern Persian Faridun (which see).

Triton (tri'ton). [Gr. Τρίτων.] In Greek and Latin mythology, a son of Poseidon and Amphitrite (or Celæno), who dwelt with his father and mother in a golden palace at the bottom of the sea, and was a gigantic and redoubtable divinity. In the later mythology Tritons appear as a race of subordinate sea-deities, fond of pleasure and figuring with the Nereids in the train of the greater sea-gods; they were conceived as combining the human figure with that of lower animals or monsters. A common attribute of Tritons is a shell-trumpet, which they blow to quiet the restless waves.

Tritons. See Triton.

Triumph of Cæsar, The. A series of nine paintings in tempera on linen, each nine feet square, by Mantegna, in Hampton Court Palace, England. Cæsar advances in a chariot, attended by a train of soldiers, captives, and trophies.

Triumph of Death, The. A fresco in the Campo Santo, Pisa, formerly ascribed to Orcagna, but now to the Lorenzetti (1350). It is an allegory contrasting worldly pomp and delight with their annihilation in death and with the outcome in a future existence.

Triumph of Galatea. See Galatea.

Triumph of Silenus. A painting by Rubens, in the Old Museum at Berlin (until 1885 at Blenheim Palace). Silenus totters forward, supported by a negro and a satyr and preceded by a faun with a flute. In front are boys and a tiger, and behind nymphs and satyrs with a landscape background. Vandyke is said to have collaborated in this painting.

Triumvirate (tri-um'vi-rāt), First. In Roman history, an agreement or alliance formed in B. C. 60 between Cæsar, Pompey, and Crassus, for the purpose of dividing the power among them. Cæsar obtained the consulship for the next year (69) and a command in Cisalpine Gaul (extended to Transalpine Gaul) and Hyrcania for 5 years (extended for 5 years more). Pompey received for his veterans assignments of lands, and for himself later the commissionership of corn supplies. By a renewal of the league at Luca in 53, Pompey received the consulship and command in Spain, and Crassus the consulship and command in the East (where he was killed in 53). The union between Cæsar and Pompey was formally broken by the civil war in 49.

Triumvirate, Second. An alliance formed in 43 B. C. between Octavian (Augustus), Mark Antony, and Lepidus, on an island in the river Reno, near Bologna. The triumvirs were to have consular powers for 3 years; they appointed magistrates, and their decrees were valid as laws. Octavian received Africa and the Islands; Antony, Gaul; Lepidus, Spain and Narbonensis. The alliance was followed by a wholesale proscription, and by the overthrow of the republicans under Brutus and Cassius in 42. Lepidus was soon reduced to a minor position, and eventually banished. By a treaty at Brundisium Octavian received the West and Antony the East. The union was broken in 31, and Antony was overthrown in the battle of Actium.

Trivia (triv'i-jī), or the Art of Walking the Streets of London. A burlesque poem by Gay, published in 1716. It is a mine of information on outdoor life in the reign of Queen Anne.

Troad (trō'ad), The. The region at the north-western extremity of Asia Minor, included between the Ægean, the Hellespont, the Sea of Marmora, Mount Ida, and the Gulf of Adramyttium; the ancient Troas. It contained the Homeric Troy (which see).

Trobian (trô-bryon'), Philippe Regis de. Born at Tours, France, June 4, 1816; died at Bayport, L. I., N. Y., July 15, 1897. A French-American officer, journalist, and author. He emigrated to the United States in 1841; was editor and proprietor of the "Revue de Nouveau Monde," New York, 1849-50; and was joint editor of the "Courrier des Etats-Unis" 1854-61. He joined the United States volunteer service as colonel in 1861, and became brigadier-general of volunteers in 1864. He commanded a brigade of the 2d army corps in the engagements at Deep Bottom, Petersburg, Hatcher's Run, and Five Forks, and was at the head of a division in the final operations against Richmond. He was brevetted major-general of volunteers in 1865; entered the regular army as colonel of the 31st infantry in 1866; and was placed on the retired list in 1879. Author of "Quatre ans de campagnes à l'armée du Potomac" (1867).

Trobian (trô-bré-änd') Islands. A group of small islands, east of New Guinea and south of New Britain.

Trocadero (trô-kä-dä-rô). A fort near Cadiz, Spain, taken by the French Aug. 31, 1823.

Trocadero. A square in Paris, situated on the right bank of the Seine, opposite the Champ-de-Mars. It contained the Exposition building in 1878.

Trocadero, Palais du. See Palais du Trocadero.

Trochu (trô-shü'), Louis Jules. Born at Palais, Morbihan, France, May 12, 1815; died at Tours, France, Oct. 7, 1896. A French general. He served in Algeria, in the Crimean war, and in the Italian war of 1859; was appointed governor of Paris in Aug., 1870; became member of the government of national defense and was charged with the defense of Paris in Sept.; resigned in Jan., 1871; was a deputy 1871-72; and resigned from the army in 1873. He wrote "L'Armée française en 1867," and several works in his own defense.

Troezen (trê-zen). [Gr. Τροίζην.] In ancient geography, a city of Peloponnesus, Greece, situated near the coast 39 miles southwest of Athens. It was originally an Ionian settlement, but later became Doric. It took an active part in the Persian wars, and sided later with Sparta.

Troezen, anciently Posidonia (Strab. viii. p. 542; Steph. Byz. ad voc.), was situated on the eastern coast of the Peloponnesus, not quite two miles (15 stades) from the shore, between the peninsula of Methana and Hermione. The remains of the ancient city may be traced near the modern village of Dhâmalâ. Ravelinon, Herod., IV. 84, note.

Troglodytæ (trog-lô-dî-tê). [L., from Gr. τρογλοδύτης, one who creeps into holes.] Cave-dwellers; troglodytes; a name given in antiquity to various races of men, especially to certain inhabitants of the shores of the Red Sea.

Trogus Pompeius (trô-gus pom-pé-yus). Lived about 10 A. D. A Roman historian, author of a general history, partly preserved in an epitome by Justin. See the extract.

About the same time as Livy, and as it were to supplement his history, Trogus wrote his Universal History, Historie Philippice, in 44 books, beginning with Ninus and extending to the writer's own time, from a Greek source (probably Timagenes); it was composed in a lively style and classical diction, and was also more rich in material and less rhetorical than Livy. We know the work chiefly through the abridgment of Justinus. Besides his historical work, Trogus wrote also on zoology and botany, after the best authorities, Aristotle and Theophrastus.

Teufel and Schwabe, Hist. of Rom. Lit. (tr. by Warr), I. 531.

Troil (troil), Magnus. The udaler or magnate of Zeland in Scott's novel "The Pirate." His daughters Minna and Brenda are the principal female characters.

Troilus (trô-i-lus). In Greek legend, according to a common account, a son of Priam. See Troilus and Cressida.

Troilus and Cressida (trô-i-lus and kres-i-dä). 1. A poem by Chaucer, written about 1369. It is a version of Boccaccio's "Filostrato." There are additions, however, which show his reading of the "Geste de Troie" of Benoit de Sainte-Maure (in which the story first appeared as an addition of Sainte-Maure to the legendary history of Troy ascribed to Dares Phrygius and Dictys Cretensis), or of the Latin version of Sainte-Maure by Guido Colonna. The Lollius to whom Chaucer attributes the story is now thought to be mythical.

2. A play by Dekker and Chettle, acted in 1599.—3. A tragedy by Shakspeare, thought to be altered from an older one. It was played at the Globe about 1600, licensed to be printed in 1603 and 1609, and printed in the folio edition of 1623.

Troilus and Cressida, or Truth Found too Late. A play by Dryden, printed in 1678, in which he undertook to "correct" what he "opined was in all probability" one of "Shakspeare's first Endeavours on the Stage."

Trois Couleurs (trwä kö-lër'). Les. [F., 'The Tricolor.'] A popular French political song, written after 1830 by Adolphe Vogel, celebrating the fall of the white flag and the return of the tricolor.

Trois Échelles (trwä zä-shel'). [F., 'three ladders.'] The executioner of Louis XI. of France. Scott introduces him in "Quentin Durward."

Trois Mousquetaires (trwä môs-ke-târ'). Les. [F., 'The Three Musketeers.'] A novel by Alexandre Dumas père, published in 1844. The scene is laid in the time of Richelieu. The three musketeers are Athos, Porthos, and Aramis, but D'Artagnan is the principal character. See these names.

Troizen. See Trazen.

Trojan (trô-jan) Cycle, The. A group of legends or poems relating to the Trojan war. See Cyclic Poets.

Trojan War. In Greek legend, a war waged for ten years by the confederated Greeks under the lead of Agamemnon, king of Mycenæ and Argolis, against the Trojans and their allies, for the recovery of Helen, wife of Menelaus, king of Sparta or Lacedæmon, who had been carried off by Paris, son of the Trojan king Priam. See Iliad.

The dates for the Trojan war vary almost two centuries. Duris placed it as early as B. C. 1335 (Clem. Alex. Stromat. i. p. 337, A.). Clemens in B. C. 1149. Isocrates, Ephorus, Democritus, and Phanias seemed to have inclined to the later, Herodotus, Thucydides, the author of the Life of Homer, and the compiler of the Parian Marble, to the earlier period. The date now usually received, B. C. 1183, is that of Eratosthenes, whose chronology was purely artificial and rested on no solid basis. The following is a list of the principal views on this subject: Duris placed the fall of Troy in 1335 B. C.; author of the Life of Homer, 1270; Herodotus, 1260; Thucydides, 1260; Parian Marble, 1209; Eratosthenes, 1183; Sosibius, 1171; Ephorus, 1169; Clemens, 1149. Ravelinon, Herod., II. 223, note.

Trollope (trol'up), Anthony. Born at London, April 24, 1815; died Dec. 6, 1882. An English novelist, son of Frances Trollope. He studied at Harrow and Winchester, and spent the greater part of his life in the postal service, as inspector in Ireland, England, and abroad. He assisted in establishing the "Fortnightly Review" in 1865. In 1867 he retired from the post-office and undertook the management of "St. Paul's," a magazine which existed only for about 3½ years. He came to the United States in 1868 on post-office affairs and with a view to establishing an international copyright. Among his novels, in many of which the same characters (notably Mrs. Froudie and Lady Glencora) and the same localities reappear, retaining their identity, are "The Mademoiselle of Ballycloran" (1847), "The Kellys and the O'Kellys" (1848), "La Vendée" (1850), "The Warden" (1855), "Barchester Towers" (1857), "The Three Clerks" (1857), "Doctor Thorne" (1858), "The Bertrams" (1859), "Castle Richmond" (1860), "Orley Farm" (1861-62), "Framley Parsonage" (1861), "Tales of All Countries" (1861-63), "The Struggles of Brown, Jones, and Robinson" (1862), "Rachel Ray" (1863), "The Small House at Allington" (1864), "Can You Forgive Her?" (1864), "Miss Mackenzie" (1865), "The Claverings" (1867), "Nina Balatka" (1867), "The Last Chronicle of Barset" (1867), "Linda Tressel" (1868), "He Knew He was Right" (1869), "Phineas Finn" (1869), "The Vicar of Bullhampton" (1870), "Sir Harry Hotspur of Humblethwaite" (1870), "Phineas Redux" (1873), "Lady Anna" (1874), "Harry Heathcote, etc." (1874), "The Way we Live Now" (1875), "The Prime Minister" (1875), "The American Senator" (1877), "Is He Popenjoy?" (1878), "John Caldigate" (1879), "An Eye for an Eye" (1879), "Cousin Henry" (1879), "The Duke's Children" (1880), "Ayala's Angel" (1881), "Dr. Wortle's School" (1881), "The Fixed Period" (1882), "Kept in the Dark" (1882), "Marion Fay" (1882), "Mr. Scarborough's Family" (1882), "The Land Leaguers" (unfinished, 1882), "An Old Man's Love" (1884). His "Autobiography" was published in 1883; it was written in 1875-76, with additions in 1879. Among his books of travel are "The West Indies and the Spanish Main" (1859), "North America" (1862), and travels in South Africa, Australia, etc. He also wrote lives of Cicero (1880), and of Thackeray (in "English Men of Letters," 1879), etc.

Trollope, Mrs. (Frances Milton). Born at Stapleton, near Bristol, 1780; died at Florence, Oct. 6, 1863. An English novelist and writer of travels, the mother of Anthony and T. Adolphus Trollope. She lived in the United States 1829-32. She wrote "Domestic Manners of the Americans" (1832; which created much comment) and various travels on the Continent. Among her numerous novels are "The Vicar of Wrexhill," "The Widow Barnaby," and "Petticoat Government."

Trollope, Thomas Adolphus. Born April 29, 1810; died at Clifton, Nov. 11, 1892. An English writer, brother of Anthony Trollope. He was educated at Winchester and Oxford. He went to Italy in 1841, and resided in Florence till 1873, when he went to Rome. In 1888 he returned to England. He wrote "A Summer in Brittany" (1840), "A Summer in Western France" (1841), "Impressions of a Wanderer, etc." (1850), "The Girlhood of Catherine de' Medici" (1856), "A Decade of Italian Women" (1859; Vittoria Colonna was included in this), "Tuscany in 1849 and in 1859" (1859), "Filippo Strozzi" (1860), "Paul V. the Pope and Paul the Friar" (1860), "A Lenten Journey in Umbria, etc." (1862), "A History of the Commonwealth of Florence" (1865), "The Papal Conclaves as they Were and as they Are" (1876), "Life of Pope Pius the Ninth" (1877), "A Peep Behind the Scenes at Rome" (1877), "Sketches from French History" (1878), "What I Remember" (1887), etc. He wrote also a number of novels, among them "La Beata," "Lindisfarne Chase," "Diamond Cut Diamond," and "The Garstangs of Garstang Grange." His second wife, Frances Eleanor Ternan, has written a number of novels, among them "Aunt Margaret's Trouble," "The Sacristan's Household," and "That Unfortunate Marriage." With her husband she wrote "Homes and Haunts of the Italian Poets" (1881).

[L. Troja, Gr. Τροία, Τροίη, Τρωία, Τροίη.] An ancient city of the Troad, famous in Greek legend as the capital of Priam and the object of the siege by the allied Greeks under Agamemnon. See Iliad and Trojan War. The site of this Homeric city was generally believed in antiquity to be identical with that of the Greek Ilium (which see), the modern Hisarlık; and this view has been supported in recent times most notably by Schliemann, whose explorations at Hisarlık laid bare remains of a series (6 or 7) of ancient towns, one above the other, at least one of which is universally admitted to be prehistoric. The third and later the second from the bottom he identified with the Homeric town. On the other hand, some scholars regard the situation of Ilium as irreconcilable with Homer's description of Troy, and prefer a site in the neighborhood of the modern Bunárbashi, holding Schliemann's results to be inconclusive.

Troy (troi). The capital of Rensselaer County, New York, situated on the eastern bank of the Hudson, 6 miles north of Albany, at the head of steam navigation of the Hudson. It is practically the terminus of the Erie and Champlain canals, and has extensive manufactures of iron, steel, stoves, shirts, collars, etc. It is the seat of the Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute. Troy was settled by the Dutch in the latter part of the 18th century, and was incorporated in 1816. The name Troy was adopted in 1789. Pop. (1900), 60,651.

Trujillo, Intendency of. See Libertad.

Truli (tró'li). [MGr. Τροίλοι.] See the extract.

Some Gothic soldiers bought from some Vandals a trula of wheat for an aureus. As the trula was only the third part of a pint, and the aureus was worth about twelve shillings, the bargain did not redound greatly to the profit of the Visigoths, who received from the other nation the contemptuous nickname of Truli. Many a time, as we can well imagine, were the streets of Spanish towns made red with Teuton blood, and the yellow locks of slain barbarians lay thick across the pathway, after the taunting shout "Truli, Truli" and some unknown word of answering defiance had greeted the ears of the trembling provincials. Hudgkin, Italy and her Invaders, I. 416.

Trullian (trul'an) Council. 1. The sixth ecumenical council, held in the imperial palace in Constantinople, Nov. 7, 680, -Sept. 16, 681; so named from the domed hall (trullus) in which it was held. It deposed Macarius, patriarch of Alexandria, as a Monothelite, and condemned Pope Honorius I. for holding similar views.

2. The name of the Quinisext Council, held at Constantinople in 692, considered as ecumenical in the Eastern Church, but not so acknowledged in the Western: called the second Trullian Council or Synod. It allowed the continuance in marriage of the priests, and passed a number of canons inconsistent with Roman authority and Western legislation and usages.

Trulliber (trul'i-bér), Parson. In Fielding's novel "Joseph Andrews," a coarse and brutal curate represented as lacking all the virtues which Parson Adams (see Adams) possessed. He is exhibited in an interview with Adams in which the latter's request for a small sum of money brings out all the uncharitableness and brutality of Trulliber's nature.

Tsaribrod, or Zaribrod (tsár'i-bród). A place in Bulgaria, 34 miles north-northwest of Sofia. There, Nov. 23, 1885, the Bulgarians defeated the Servians.

Tsaritzin (tsár-it'zin). A town in the government of Saratoff, Russia, situated on the Volga 230 miles northwest of Astrakhan. It has important transit trade by railway and river. Population (1891), 40,130.

Tsarskoi Selo (tsár-skó'i sá'ló). A town in the government of St. Petersburg, Russia, about 15 miles south of St. Petersburg. It contains a famous imperial palace, a favorite summer residence of the court. The old palace, begun in 1744, is 750 feet long. The interior is richly decorated; the walls of one room are inlaid with amber, those of another with lapis lazuli. The magnificent marble gallery, 270 feet long, connects the palace with a detached building. The park is full of caprices, such as a Chinese tower and village, an Egyptian pyramid, a Turkish kiosk, and the so-called doll-houses of the princesses.

Tschaikovsky (chí-kof'ski), Peter Ilitch. Born at Volkinsk, province of Vyatka, April 25, 1840; died at St. Petersburg, Nov. 7, 1893.

A noted Russian composer. In 1862, when the Conservatory of Music was founded at St. Petersburg, he gave up an official position to devote himself to music. He studied composition with Anton Rubinstein, and harmony and counterpoint with Zarembo; and from 1866 to 1878 was professor of harmony, composition, and the history of music in the conservatory. From 1878 he gave himself entirely to composition. He visited England in 1881 and 1889. In 1891 he came to New York at the invitation of the New York Symphony Society, and conducted a number of his own compositions. He wrote several operas and other music, but is best known from his "Fifth Symphony in E minor," "Fourth Symphony in F minor," "Third Suite," "Francesca da Rimini" (a symphonic poem) and his two overtures to "Hamlet" and "Romeo and Juliet" respectively. His "Sixth Symphony" was not performed till after his death.

Tuamotu Islands. See Low Archipelago.

Tubal (tū'bal). One of the sons of Japheth, according to the account in Genesis.

Tubal and Meshech, whose names follow that of Javan, are almost always coupled together in the Old Testament, and were famous for their skill in archery. In the Assyrian inscriptions the names appear as Tublá and Muská, and they were known to the classical geographers as Tibareni and Moskhi. In classical days, however, their seats were further to the north than they had been in the age of the Assyrian monuments. In the time of Sargon and Sennacherib their territories still extended as far south as Cilicia and the northern half of Komagéné. Later they were forced to retreat northward toward the Black Sea, and it was in this region of Asia Minor that Xenophon and his Greek troops found their scanty remains.

See Sayce, Races of the O. T., p. 48.

Tubal. A Jew, the friend of Shylock, in Shakespeare's "Merchant of Venice."

Tubal-Cain (tū'bal-kān or -kā'in). Son of Lamech the Cainite and Zillah: the pioneer of workers in brass and iron, according to the account in Genesis.

Tubantes (tū-ban'téz). [L. (Tacitus) Tubantes, Gr. (Ptolemy) Toi'βαυροι.] A German tribe located by Tacitus on the right bank of the Rhine, north of the Lippe, in territory afterward occupied by the Usipites. Ptolemy subsequently places them further to the south, back from the Rhine, near the Chatti. They were probably merged ultimately in the Alamanni.

Tubar (tō-bār'). See Tarahumar.

Tübingen (tū'bing-en). A town in the Black Forest Circle, Württemberg, situated on the Neckar, at the junction of the Ammer and Steinlach, 18 miles south-southwest of Stuttgart. The castle Hohentübingen, built in the first half of the 16th century, occupies a commanding position: it now contains the university library. The university, one of the most celebrated in Germany, was founded by Count Eberhard-im-Bart in 1477. It adhered to the Reformation, and has long been noted for its theological teaching, which, especially under F. C. Baur, founder of the so-called "Tübingen School" (which see), has latterly been distinctively of a liberal and advanced type. The university has about 1,000 instructors and about 1,400 students. Tübingen fell to Württemberg in 1342. It was taken by the Swabian League in 1519, and by the French in 1647 and 1688. Population (1890), 13,273.

Tübingen, Treaty of. A treaty, concluded on July 10, 1514, by which Duke Ulrich's subjects secured certain privileges from him in return for their payment of his debts.

Tübingen School. A name given to a certain phase of modern rationalistic philosophy which took its rise (1825-60) at the University of Tübingen, in Germany, under Ferdinand Christian Baur. The fundamental principle of this school is that the books of the New Testament were written for the purpose of establishing certain opinions and parties in the early church; that many of them were written at a later date than the one usually assigned to them; and that they are rather valuable as indications of the spirit of the early church than as authoritative revelations or even as authentic records. The name is also sometimes, though more rarely, given to an earlier school in the same university which taught almost exactly the reverse—namely, the credibility, integrity, and authority of the New Testament.

Tubuai (tō-bō-ī') Islands. A group of islands in Polynesia, south of the Society Islands, belonging to France since 1881. Also called Austral Islands. Population (1888), 1,881.

Tubular Bridge, Britannia. See Britannia Tubular Bridge.

Tubus (tō-bōz'). A tribe of the Sahara.

Tucca (tuk'ä), Captain. A bragging bully in Jonson's "Poetaster." Dekker introduces him in his "Satiromastix," but without the success which attended Jonson's character.

Tucca is the creation of Jonson. He is described as a general railer, a man whose whole conversation is made up of scurrilous exaggerations and impossible falsehoods. Gifford, Memoirs of Ben Jonson, p. xii, note.

Tuck (tuk), Friar. A vagabond monk, a character in the Robin Hood ballads and legends and in the morris-dance. Sir Walter Scott introduces him in "Ivanhoe" as the "holy clerk of Copmanhurst."

Tucker (tuk'er), Abraham. Born at London, Sept. 2, 1705; died Nov. 20, 1774. An English metaphysician and moralist. He wrote "The Light of Nature Pursued" under the pseudonym "Edward Search" (4 vols. 1768; 3 vols. edited after his death; edited again by Millard 1805).

Tucker, Charlotte Maria. Born in England in 1821; died in India, Dec. 2, 1893. An English writer, mostly of juvenile or religious works under the signature "A. L. O. E." (A Lady of England). When she was fifty-four years old she went as a missionary to India, and worked there for eighteen years. She wrote more than fifty volumes, the proceeds of which were used for the benefit of the missions.

Tucker, Nathaniel Beverley. Born at Williamsburg, Va., Sept. 6, 1784; died at Winchester, Va., Aug. 26, 1851. An American jurist, novelist, and political writer. His best-known work is the novel "The Partisan Leader: a Tale of the Future" (1836).

Tuckerman (tuk'er-man), Edward. Born at Boston, Mass., Dec., 1817; died at Amherst, Mass., March 15, 1886. An American botanist, noted as a lichenologist: professor at Amherst College from 1858.

Tuckerman, Henry Theodore. Born at Boston, Mass., April 20, 1813; died at New York, Dec. 17, 1871. An American critic, essayist, and poet. His works include "Italian Sketch-Book" (1835), "Isabel, or Sicily" (1839), "Rambles and Reveries" (1841), "Thoughts on the Poets" (1846), "Artist Life" (1847), "Characteristics of Literature" (1849-51), "Essays" (1857), and "Book of the Artists" (1867).

Tuckerman's Ravine. [Named from Prof. Edward Tuckerman.] A deep ravine on the side of Mount Washington, New Hampshire.

Tucson (tū-sōn' or tuk'sōn). The capital of Pima County, Arizona, situated on the Santa Cruz River in lat. 32° 14' N. It is one of the chief towns of the Territory, and was formerly its capital. It was founded by Spanish Jesuits in the middle of the 16th century. Population (1900), 7,531.

Tucuman (tō-kō-man'). A colonial division (gubernacion) of Spanish South America. It corresponded nearly to the modern provinces of Córdoba, Rioja, Catamarca, Santiago del Estero, Tucuman, Salta and Jujuy, now in the Argentine Republic. The capital was Tucuman. It was a part of the viceroyalty of Peru, subordinate to Charcas, until 1776, when it was attached to the viceroyalty of La Plata.

Tucuman. An interior province of the Argentine Republic, surrounded by Salta, Santiago del Estero, and Catamarca. The surface is hilly. Principal products, sugar, rum, and wheat. Area, about 9,400 square miles. Population (1895), 215,693.

Tucuman, or San Miguel de Tucuman. The capital of the province of Tucuman, situated on the Tala about lat. 26° 50' S. Independence was proclaimed here July 9, 1816. Population (1895), 34,297.

Tucunas (tō-kō'näs), or Ticunas (tē-kō'näs). Indians of the upper Amazon and its branches in northeastern Peru and the adjacent parts of Brazil. They are divided into many small hordes, and are savages of a rather low grade, though harmless and friendly to the whites. The Jesuits labored among them from 1683 to 1727.

Tudela (tō-ghā'lā). A town in the province of Navarre, Spain, situated on the Ebro 47 miles northwest of Saragossa. A victory was gained near Tudela, Nov., 1808, by the French under Lannes over the Spanish. Population (1887), 9,213.

Tudor (tū'dor). [W. Teudyr, L. Theodorus. Gr. Θεόδωρος; see Theodorus.] An English dynasty, descended on the male side from Owen Tudor, on the female side from John of Gaunt through the Beauforts. It comprised the sovereigns Henry VII., Henry VIII., Edward VI., Mary, and Elizabeth.

Tudor, Jasper. Earl of Pembroke. Died about

1495. Son of Owen Tudor and Catharine of France, and uncle of Henry VII.: a Lancastrian partizan.

Tudor, Owen. Executed 1461. A Welsh knight who married Catharine, widow of Henry V., and was grandfather of Henry VII. He joined the Lancastrians.

Tufts (tufts) College. An institution of learning founded by Charles Tufts, situated at Medford, Massachusetts: opened in 1855. It is non-sectarian, and has about 800 students.

Tugendbund (tō'gent-bōnt). A German association formed at Königsberg, 1808, with the acknowledged purpose of cultivating patriotism, reorganizing the army, and encouraging education, and with the secret aim of aiding in throwing off the French yoke. Frederick William III. was forced to dissolve it in 1809; but it continued in secret for several years, and exerted a very considerable influence, especially in 1812. It was vehemently attacked in 1816 by reactionary politicians.

Tuggurt (tūg-gōrt'). A town in an oasis in the province of Constantine, Algeria, about lat. 33° 14' N. Population, about 5,000.

Tugh (tōgh). See the extract.

The Tugh, or ensign of the Turkish tribes, was originally the tail of a yak; but when the Ottomans left Central Asia, that of a horse was substituted. Governors of provinces received one, two, or three tughs, according to their rank; the Sultan alone displayed seven.

Pooler, Story of Turkey, p. 278, note.

Tughra (tōgh'rā). See the extract.

Among the functionaries who formed the first department were the Deftedar, or Minister of Finance, and the Nishānji Bashi, whose duty was to trace the Tughra or cypher of the Sultan at the head of all the documents presented to him for that purpose. This Tughra, with the appearance of which most of us are familiar from seeing it on Turkish coins and postage-stamps or on pieces of embroidery or inlaid mother-of-pearl work, contains, ornamentally written as a sort of monogram, the names of the reigning Sultan and his father, together with the title Khan and the epithet et-muzafar-daimā, or 'victor ever.' The Tughra is said to have originated in this way: Sultan Murād I. entered into a treaty with the Ragusans, but when the document was brought for his signature, he, being unable to write, wetted his open hand with ink and pressed it on the paper. The first, second, and third fingers were together, but the thumb and fourth finger were apart. Within the mark thus formed the scribes wrote the names of Murād and his father, the title Khan, and the 'victor ever.' The Tughra, as we now have it, is the result of this: the three long upright lines represent Murād's three middle fingers, the rounded lines at the left side are his bent thumb, and the straight ones at the right his little finger.

Pooler, Story of Turkey, p. 328.

Tuhwalati. See Atfalati.

Tuileries (tū'el-riz; F. pron. tū'el-ré'). Palace of the. [F. tuileries, tile-kilns.] A royal residence formerly existing in Paris, connected with the Louvre by wings. In 1518 Francis I. bought a house here for the Duchesse d'Angoulême. It was demolished in 1564 by Catharine de' Medici, who began the erection of the Tuileries, which was enlarged by Henry IV. and Louis XIV. The palace, the scene of many of the most memorable disasters attending the subversion of the ancient French monarchy, was invaded by the mob June 20, and stormed by the mob Aug. 10, 1792, and was the seat of the Convention. It was taken by the people July 29, 1830, and Feb. 24, 1848, and was burned by the Commune in 1871, the ruins not being removed till 1883. Nothing remains except the pavilions at the two extremities, which have been restored and now form a rich architectural termination to the two extended arms of the Louvre. Its history as a royal residence came to an end with the battle of Sedan and the departure of the empress Eugénie. The Jardin des Tuileries, a popular promenade, was enlarged in 1889, and now covers the site of the palace. The Quai des Tuileries existed in a very early period as the road to St.-Cloud. The wall of Charles V. terminated at the Tour du Bois, between the Louvre and the Tuileries. Outside of this wall were the tile-yards or tuileries, mentioned as early as 1274. In 1865 excavations disclosed the furnaces of Palissy here.

Tuke (tūk), William. Born at York, 1732; died 1822. An English philanthropist. He was especially devoted to the amelioration of the condition of the insane. In 1792 he projected the "Retreat" at York under the management of the Society of Friends, in which it was attempted to manage the insane without the excessive restraint then common. His improvements led to important legislation on the treatment of the insane after his death. His grandson, Samuel Tuke (1784-1857) wrote an account of the Retreat (1813), and published works on the construction of hospitals for the insane.

Tukuarika (tō'kwā-rē'kā), or Tucarica, or Sheep-eaters. ["Sheep-eaters."] A tribe of North American Indians, formerly in Yellowstone Park, subsequently on Lemhi and Malad rivers in western central Idaho, and now on Lemhi reservation. Number (1893), 108. See Shoshoni.

chiefly nomads, dwelling in eastern and central Siberia, east of the Yenisei, and in the basin of the Amur. Their numbers are estimated at 70,000-80,000.

Tunis (tü'nis), F. Tunisie (tü-né-zé'). A French protectorate in northern Africa. Capital, Tunis. It is bounded by the Mediterranean on the north and east, Tripoli on the southeast, the desert on the south, and Algeria on the west. The north, east, and center are occupied by comparatively low mountains, and there are considerable lakes ("shotts") in the south. The principal river is the Medjerda. The island of Jerba and the Kerkenna group belong to Tunis. It produces grain and fruits (particularly dates, olives, etc.), and has important fisheries. Government is administered nominally by a native bey, actually by France through a minister resident, supported by a corps of occupation. The inhabitants are Berbers, Arabs, and Jews, and in less numbers Italians, Turks, Maltese, and French. The prevailing religion is the Mohammedan. The region in ancient times formed part of the domains of Carthage and of Rome, and as part of Roman Africa it flourished greatly under the empire, and was the leading seat of Latin Christianity. It was conquered by the Vandals in the 5th century, by the Greeks in the 6th, and by the Arabs in the 7th; was invaded by St. Louis in 1270, and by the emperor Charles V. in 1535; was reduced to a Turkish province about 1575; was ruled by deys and beys, and was long noted as a piratical state; and was occupied by a French army in 1881, and (May 12) made a French protectorate. Area, about 61,000 square miles. Population, estimated, 1,500,000.

Tunis. A seaport, capital of Tunis, situated on a lagoon connected with the Gulf of Tunis, in lat. 36° 50' N., long. 10° 12' E.: the Roman Tunes. The port Goletta is situated at the entrance to the lagoon. Tunis is the center of a caravan trade; is connected by steamer lines with France and Italy, and by a railroad with Constantine, Oram, and Algiers; and has textile and other manufactures. The seat of government is at the neighboring castle of Bardo. The chief objects of interest are the bazaars, the mosque of the Olive Tree, the town palace of the bey, and the Moslem college and other institutions. The ruins of Carthage are situated to the northeast. The city was founded in Carthaginian times. It was conquered by the emperor Charles V. in 1535. Population, estimated, 135,000.

Tunis, Gulf of. An inlet of the Mediterranean, northeast of Tunis.

Tunja (tön'hä). The capital of the department of Boyacá, Colombia, 75 miles north-northeast of Bogotá. Near it is the battle-field of Boyacá (which see). Population, estimated, 8,000.

Tunstall (tun'stal). A town in Staffordshire, England, 29 miles south of Manchester. It has manufactures of pottery, ironware, etc. Population (1891), 15,730.

Tunstall (tun'stal), or Tonstall (ton'stal), Cuthbert. Born at Hatchford, Yorkshire, England, about 1475; died at Lambeth Palace, 1559. An English prelate. He was made bishop of London in 1522, was sent to the Tower in 1551, and deprived of his see in 1552; was restored by Mary; and was again deprived by Elizabeth in 1559. He was lord privy seal under Henry VIII.

Tuolumne (twol'um-nö) River. A river in California which joins the San Joaquin River 25 miles south of Stockton. Length, 150-175 miles.

Tupac (tö'pák), called Toparca (tö-pär'kä) by Spanish historians. Born about 1514; died at Jaña, Oct., 1533. A younger brother of the Inca Atahualpa of Peru. After the execution of Atahualpa (Aug., 1533), he was made nominal ruler of Peru by Pizarro, and forced to swear allegiance to the Spanish monarchs. He died during the march to Cuzco.

Tupac Amaru (tö'pák ä'mä-rö). Born about 1544; died at Cuzco, Dec. (?), 1571. Youngest son of Manco Inca: a legitimate sovereign of Peru by the death of his elder brothers. He assumed the Incaial insignia in the mountains of Vilcabamba, but made no attempt to oppose the Spaniards. By order of the viceroy Toledo he was seized in Oct., 1571, taken to Cuzco, and beheaded. With him the male line of the Incas became extinct.

Tupac Amaru (José Gabriel Condorcanqui). Born at Tinta, south of Cuzco, 1742; died at Cuzco, May 18, 1781. A Peruvian revolutionist, called "the Last of the Incas." He was a direct descendant of the early Incas, and, under Spanish rule, was chief of several villages. In 1771 he assumed the name Tupac Amaru. After vain efforts to ameliorate the condition of the Indians, he headed a rebellion in Nov., 1780. Over 60,000 Indians joined him, and he was universally regarded by them as the Inca, though he did not assume that title nor promise anything more than a redress of wrongs. For a time he held all the region between Cuzco and Lake Titicaca, but was defeated and captured in March, 1781, in pursuance of a sentence by the Spanish Judge Arche, he and most of his family were executed in a horrible manner. In the war of extermination which followed it is said that 80,000 Indians were killed. His cousin, Diego, after holding out for some time, was pardoned; but subsequently was arrested on a frivolous charge and, with others of the family, was tortured and killed. Women and children were included in these executions, the evident object being to extirpate the Inca race. Tupac Amaru's son Fernando, a child of 10 years, was condemned to penal servitude for life. He was sent to Spain, and his ultimate fate is unknown; but in 1828 a person calling himself Fernando Tupac Amaru was given a pension at Buenos Ayres: he became a monk in Lima, where he died. The rebellion of Tupac Amaru was the most formidable in the colonial history of South America. The cruelties with which it was suppressed, by exciting hatred of the Spaniards, had a strong influence on the war for independence. The reforms which Tupac Amaru demanded were instituted in part not long after his death.

Tupac Yupanqui (tö'pák yö-pän'ké), or Tupac Inca Yupanqui. Died at Cuzco about 1478. The tenth Inca sovereign of Peru, and the greatest conqueror of the line. He succeeded his father, Pachacutec Yupanqui, about 1440; conquered the coast region from Aconca to the Gulf of Guayaquil (see Chimu); annexed northern Chile to the river Maule, Tucuman, and large districts in the Amazon valley; and, it is said, sent an exploring expedition of rafts which discovered the Chincha Islands. Many remains of fortresses, towns, temples, etc., are ascribed to his time. Also Topa Inca Yupanqui.

Tupi-Guarany stock. Same as Tupi stock.

Tupis (tö-péz'). A general name for Brazilian Indians of the Tupi stock in Brazil, especially near the coast and on the lower Amazon. Their language in those regions was essentially the same, though the Indians were divided into many tribes: it was closely allied to the Guarany of Paraguay, and is the basis of the modern Lingoa Geral. See Tupi stock. Also written Tupys, Tupies.

Tupi stock (tö-pé'stok). One of the most important of the South American Indian linguistic stocks, extending over a great part of Brazil, Paraguay, and Uruguay, and portions of the Argentine Republic, Bolivia, Peru, Colombia, Venezuela, and Guiana. Their villages were generally near the coast or scattered along the great rivers, and often interspersed with those of Indians of other stocks. All of them, except a few tribes of the interior, spoke dialects so closely allied that they could readily understand each other. Their physical characteristics and customs were much the same; but they had no national organization: neighboring towns were often at war with each other, and distant ones had no knowledge of each other. The power of their chiefs was very limited, and was generally confined to a single village. The Tupis were agriculturists, and lived in fixed villages of considerable size, the houses framed with poles and thatched with palm-leaves or grass. They made large and serviceable wooden canoes, showed some taste in ornamenting pottery, making feather-work, etc., and were naturally intelligent. Most of them went nearly naked, painting or tattooing the face and body. In war they used bows and arrows and a heavy club called macand. They believed in certain malignant or mischievous spirits, and their medicine-men had great influence. Generally they were friendly to strangers, but when provoked were fierce warriors. Some of the tribes killed and ate their prisoners of war. The first European colonists found these Indians the dominant race all along the Brazilian coast, on the lower Amazon, Uruguay, Parana, and Paraguay; those about the Platine river-system were called collectively Guarany, as those on the Brazilian coast were called Tupis; but neither of these names was properly a tribal appellation. Most of these Indians submitted readily to missionary influence, and their descendants, mixed with European and African blood, form a large part of the country population of Brazil, northern Uruguay, northeastern Argentina, and Paraguay. A few, in the interior, retain a semi-independence. Among the extinct or existing tribes and groups of this stock are the Tupinambas, Tupiniquins, Potiguaras, Papanazes, Cates, Tupinaes, and Tamoyos of the Brazilian coast; the Tupinambas, Omaguas, Mundurucos, Mnués, Apiacés, etc., in the Amazon valley; the Guaranyos and Chiriguanoes in Bolivia, Tapés in the Argentine, Guaranyes, etc.

Tupman (tup'man). Tracy. A member of the famous Pickwick Club, in Dickens's "Pickwick Papers."

Tupper (tup'ér), Sir Charles. Born at Amherst, Nova Scotia, July 2, 1821. A Canadian Conservative statesman. He studied medicine in Edinburgh University; settled as a physician in his native town of Amherst, Nova Scotia; and was president of the Canadian Medical Association 1857-70. He entered the provincial legislature in 1855, and was prime minister of Nova Scotia 1864-67. He advocated the formation of the Dominion of Canada, which took place in 1867; and in 1870 entered Macdonald's cabinet, going out of office with his chief in 1873. He took office as minister of public works on Macdonald's return to power in 1878; and from 1879 to 1884 was minister of railways and canals, in which capacity he promoted the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. In 1884 he was appointed high commissioner for Canada at London, and was prime minister of Canada in 1896. He was one of the negotiators of the fisheries treaty with the United States 1887-88, and was created a baronet in the latter year.

Tupper, Martin Farquhar. Born at London, July 17, 1810; died Nov. 29, 1889. An English poet. He graduated at Christ Church, Oxford, in 1831, and was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1835, but soon abandoned law in order to devote himself to literature. His chief work is "Proverbial Philosophy" (three series 1838-67).

Tur (ör). In the Shahnamah, the second of the three sons—Salm, Tur, and Iraj—of Faridun. His mother was Shahrinaz, daughter of Jamshid. In the division by Faridun of his realms Tur obtained Turan. Roused to jealousy by Iraj by Salm, he joins Salm against him, and murders Iraj when the latter comes with overtures of peace. Iraj is avenged by Minukhidh, who slays Tur in battle. See Salm.

Tura (ö'rü). A river in eastern Russia and western Siberia which joins the Tobol below Tyumen. Length, about 500 miles.

Turanian (tü-rä'ni-an). [Pers. Turan, from Tür, a legendary ancestor of the Turks, etc.] A word loosely and indefinitely used to designate a family of languages and also an ethnological group. It is sometimes applied to the Asiatic languages in general outside of the Indo-European and Semitic families, and so includes various discordant and independent families; but is sometimes used especially or restrictedly of the Ural-Altaic or Scythian family.

Turberville, or Turberville (tér' bér-vil), George. Born about 1530; died about 1595. An English poet, translator, and writer on hunting.

[George] Turberville, of whom not much is known, was a Dorsetshire man of good family, and was educated at Winchester and Oxford. He was probably born before 1530, and died after 1594. Besides a book on Falconry and numerous translations (to which, like all the men of his school and day, he was much addicted), he wrote a good many occasional poems, though none of great length.

Saintsbury, Hist. of Elizabethan Lit., p. 18.

Turbia (tör'bē-ä). [F. Turbie.] A small place near Monaco. It contains a Roman tower of the time of Augustus.

Turcaret (tür-kä-rä'). A comedy by Le Sage, produced in 1709; so called from its chief character.

Despite his theatrical successes he [Le Sage] was never on very good terms with the players of the regular theatre, and a small piece — "Les Etranges" — was refused by them at the beginning of 1708. The author took it back, set to work on it, and refashioned it into "Turcaret," the best French comedy, beyond all doubt, of the 18th century, and probably the best of its kind to be found outside the covers of Molière's works.

Saintsbury, French Novelists, p. 71.

Turcomans. See Turkoman.

Turdus Solitarius (tér'dns sol-i-tä'ri-us). [NL., 'Solitary Thrush.'] A constellation introduced by Le Monnier in 1776, on the tail of Hydra, and encroaching on the southern seale of Libra. It is no longer recognized.

Turenne (tü-ren'). A place in the department of Corrèze, France, 18 miles southwest of Tulle. It has a ruined château.

Turenne, Vicomte de (Henri de La Tour d'Auvergne). Born at Sedan, France, Sept. 11, 1611; killed at Sasbach, near Offenbürg, Baden, July 27, 1675. A celebrated French marshal, grandson of William the Silent. He was brought up in the Reformed Church; learned the art of war under his uncle Maurice of Nassau; and was given a regiment in the French army by Richelieu in 1630. He served with distinction under De La Force, Cardinal La Valette, Bernhard of Saxe-Weimar, and D'Harcourt, and in 1639 was appointed to a command in Italy. He was in 1643 transferred to Germany by Mazarin, by whom he was created a marshal of France in 1644. His four brilliant campaigns in Germany (1644-47) prepared the way materially for the peace of Westphalia in 1648. During the disturbances of the Fronde (1648-53) he at first supported the parliament, but afterward sided with the court, and in 1652 defeated Condé at Gien and at the Faubourg Saint-Antoine. After the return of peace at home, he took command against the Spaniards under Condé (who had in the meantime fled from France and accepted the post of general-in-chief of the Spanish armies). His victory of the Dunes in 1658 decided the war, and was followed by the peace of the Pyrenees in 1659. He was created marshal-general of the armies of France in 1660; conquered French Flanders in 1667; abjured Protestantism and joined the Roman Catholic Church in 1668; commanded in the Netherlands in 1672; and devastated the Palatinate in 1674. He was opposed during the next campaign by the Imperial general Montecuculi, and was killed by a cannon-ball while reconnoitering at Sasbach.

Turfan (tör-fän'). An occasional name of a part of Eastern Turkestan.

Turgai (tör-gi'), or Turgansk (tör-gänsk'). A province in the Kirghiz Steppe, Russian Central Asia, situated east of Uralsk and north of the Sea of Aral and Sir-Daria. Area, 176,219 square miles. Population (1889), 364,660.

Turgenieff (tör-gän'yef), Alexander. Born 1784; died at Moscow, Dec. 17, 1845. A Russian historian, author of "Historia Russiae monumenta" (1841-42), etc.

Turgenieff, Ivan Sergeevich. Born at Orel, Russia, Nov. 9, 1818; died at Bougival, near Paris, Sept. 3, 1883. A celebrated Russian novelist. He was educated at Moscow and St. Petersburg, and in 1838 went to Berlin to study philosophy and the classics. About 1840 he received an appointment in the ministry of the interior. He began to publish poems in 1841; and his first novel, "Andrei Kolosoff," appeared in 1844. He contributed to the emancipation of the serfs through his "Annals of a Sportsman," sometimes translated as "Sketches from the Diary of a Sportsman" (1845-57); the first of these appeared in English in the "Contemporary Review" in 1847; they were also published in French and German, and raised him to a high rank as an author. In 1852 some remarks on Russian officialism, made in an obituary letter on Gogol, led to his being deprived of his position, imprisoned, and afterward banished several years in Orel, in the interior of Russia. In 1854 he was allowed to return, and in later life lived in Baden-Baden and Paris, with short visits to Russia and elsewhere. He created much personal antagonism by his analysis of political parties, and was misunderstood by those with whom he was most in sympathy. The epithet "Nihilist," which he applied to revolutionary, was applied by the government to all socialistic and democratic tendencies. Later, however, popular opinion was in his favor. Among his chief novels are "Rudin" (1855), "A Nest of Nobles" (1855), "Helene" (translated as "On the Eve," 1860), "Fathers and Sons" (1862; in this the epithet Nihilist is inroduced and defined), "Smoke" (1867), "Virgin Soil" (1876), "Punin and Baburin," "A Lear of the Steppe," "Clara Militch." He also wrote "Senilia" (1883; a poem), etc. The name is also written Turgeneff, Tourgueneff, etc.

Turgenieff, Nikolai. Born 1790; died at Paris, Nov., 1871. A Russian historian, brother of Alexander Turgenieff. He wrote "La Russie et les Russes" (1847), etc.

Turgot (tür-gó'). Anne Robert Jacques, Baron de L'Aulne. Born at Paris, May 10, 1727; died there, March 20, 1781. A noted French statesman, political economist, and financier. He at first studied theology and then law, and became an advocate in 1752, and master of "requêtes" in 1753. He was intendant of Limoges 1761-74; and was appointed minister of marine in 1774, and immediately afterward controller-general of finance. In this office he planned many reforms, including the abolition of corvées and of various feudal privileges, the securing of liberty of trade, the establishment of a comprehensive system of public instruction, etc., which outlived many of the results afterward attained by the Revolution. He was bitterly opposed by various classes, and was dismissed by the king in May, 1776. His complete works were edited by Dupont de Nemours 1808-11.

Turia (tü'ri-ä). The ancient name of the Gualdaviar.

Turin (tü'rin). A province in the compartimento of Piedmont, Italy. Area, 3,955 square miles. Population (1892), 1,097,479.

Turin, It. Torino (tö-rö'nö). The capital of the province of Turin, Italy, situated on the Po, near its junction with the Dora Riparia, in lat. 45° 4' N., long. 7° 42' E.: the ancient Tanrasia, Roman Augusta Taurinorum (whence the modern name). It is regularly built, with many squares and broad streets; is the seat of important trade for northern Italy; has varied manufactures; and is rapidly growing. It contains a university, cathedral, castle (Palazzo Madama), royal palace (with the royal armory and library), Palazzo Carignano (former seat of Parliament, now containing collections in natural history), palace of the Academy of Sciences (with a museum of antiquities and picture-gallery), monument of Cavour, etc. Victor Emmanuel and Cavour were born there. Turin was the ancient capital of the Taurini (whence the name); was captured by Hannibal in 213 B. C.; became the chief town of Piedmont, and was acquired by the dukes of Savoy in 1032; was occupied by the French in the first part of the 16th century, but was recovered by Savoy in 1562; was again taken by the French in 1649; was taken by the Imperialists under Prince Eugene in 1706; was captured by the French in 1798, and by Suvaroff in 1799; and was retaken by the French in 1800, and restored to Sardinia in 1814. Turin played an important part in the national movements of the 19th century, and was the capital of the kingdom of Italy 1861-65. Population (1901), commune, 335,656.

Turin, Treaties of. 1. A peace between France and Savoy in 1696.—2. An armistice negotiated by Bonaparte with Sardinia in 1796.

Turkestan (tör-kes-tän'), or Turkistan (tör-kis-tän'). ['Land of the Turks.'] A region with indefinite limits in Asia, east of the Caspian, south of Siberia, and north of Persia, Afghanistan, and Tibet. The name is sometimes used as synonymous with central Asia, but is generally limited to the western portion of this region, included chiefly in Russia and its dependencies, or to the highlands and plains east of the Transcaspian lowlands and west of Eastern Turkestan.

Turkestan, or Turkistan. A general government of Russian Central Asia, comprising the provinces Samarkand, Sir-Daria, and Ferghana. Area, about 258,000 square miles. Population (1885), 2,458,509.

Turkestan, Afghan. See Afghan Turkestan.

Turkestan, East. See East Turkestan.

Turkestan, Russian. See Turkestan.

Turkestan, West. That part of central Asia which is west of Eastern Turkestan. See Turkestan.

Turkey (tér'ki), or the Ottoman Empire. [F. Turquie, G. Die Türkei, It. Turchia, Sp. Turquia; Turk. name of the empire Osmanlı Vîlâyeti: NL. Turcia, from Turcus, Turk; see Turks.] An empire in the southeast of Europe, southwest of Asia, and northern Africa. Capital, Constantinople. It comprises as immediate possessions: in Europe, the vilayets or divisions of Constantinople, Adrianople, Saloniki, Monastir, Servia, Skutari, Janina, Kosovo, and Crete; in Africa, the vilayets of Tripoli and Bengazi; and in Asia, Asia Minor (12 vilayets), Armenia and Kurdistan (5), Mesopotamia (3), and Syria and Arabia (5). It has also the following nominal possessions: the tributary principality of Samos; Cyprus (administered by Great Britain); Bosnia, Herzegovina, and Novibazar (administered by Austria-Hungary); Bulgaria with Eastern Rume- lia (practically independent); and Egypt (which pays tribute). The surface is largely mountainous in European Turkey, in Asia Minor, Turkish Armenia, and Kurdistan, and in western Syria. The principal occupations are agriculture and pastoral pursuits. The leading exports are raisins, silk, mohair, opium, wheat, cotton, wool, coffee, fruits, skins, oil, and valonia. The government is an absolute monarchy under the sultan as sovereign. Government is administered by the grand vizir, the Sheik-ul-Islam, and the cabinet. The leading religion is Mohammedanism; but the Greek, Roman Catholic, Armenian, Syrian, Jewish, Protestant, and Maronite creeds are also recognized by the government. The inhabitants comprise Turks, Greeks, Armenians, Bulgarians, Albanians, Jews, Syrians, Arabs, etc. The nucleus of the Ottoman empire was formed in Asia Minor in the 13th century under Er-Togh- rul. Under his son Osman or Othman (1288-1326), who is regarded as the founder of the empire, and Osman's son Orkhan (1326-59), a powerful realm was reared on the ruins of the Seljukian and Byzantine power in Asia Minor. Amurath I. took Adrianople (1361), which he made the capital, and broke the power of Servia in 1389. The Turkish power was extended under Bajazet I., who subjugated Bulgaria and made Wallachia tributary, and under Amurath II. Mohammed II. took Constantinople and overthrew the Byzantine empire in 1453, and conquered Trebizond, etc. The empire reached its height in the 16th century, through the conquest of Syria, Egypt, Rhodes, a great part of Hungary, and the extension of suzerainty over Algeria, etc. The Turks were repulsed before Vienna in 1683; suffered great losses at the hands of Austria in the end of the 17th century and the beginning of the 18th, and at the hands of Russia in the last part of the 18th century and the beginning of the 19th: lost Greece 1821-29; had an unsuccessful war with Russia 1828-29; and took part in the Crimean war 1853-56. Egypt meanwhile had become practically independent. Insurrections in Crete, Bosnia, and Herzegovina, and wars with Servia and Montenegro, were followed by the unsuccessful war with Russia 1877-78; the independence of Rumania, Servia, and Montenegro was recognized in 1878; and Bulgaria, Bosnia, Herzegovina, and Cyprus were practically lost. Turkey was compelled to make a large cession to Greece in 1881, but was victorious in a conflict with that country in 1897. Eastern Rume- lia was united with Bulgaria in 1885. The area of Turkey's immediate possessions is estimated at over 1,000,000 square miles; the population at 27,694,600.

Turkey River. A river in northeastern Iowa which joins the Mississippi 25 miles northwest of Dubuque. Length, over 100 miles.

Türkheim (türk'him). A town in Upper Alsace, Alsace-Lorraine, 40 miles southwest of Strasbourg. There, Jan. 5, 1675, the French under Turenne defeated the Imperialists.

Turkistan. See Turkestan.

Turkmanchäi. A place in Persia, 70 miles southeast of Tabriz. Here, in 1828, peace was concluded between Russia and Persia. Russia acquired Persian Armenia, and great influence over Persia.

Turkomania (tér-kö-mä'ni-ä). The country of the Turkomans, in central Asia, north of Persia and Afghanistan; annexed by Russia.

Turkomans (tér'kö-manz). A branch of the Turkish race, found chiefly in central Asia (in Russian territory), Persia, and Afghanistan. Nearly all are nomads. Among the tribes are the Tekkes of Merv and Akhal, the Sariks, etc. Also Turcomans or *Turkman*s.

Turko-Russian Wars. See Russian Wars with Turkey.

Turks (térks). 1. The race now dominant in Turkey; the Ottomans. See Ottomans.—2. In an extended sense, the members of a race regarded as related to the Mongols: a branch of the Ural-Altaic family. In this sense the Turkish race includes the Petchenegs, Czechs, Turkomans, Ottoman Turks, etc.

A revolt took place against the Jonan-Jonan in the beginning of the sixth century, when the Turks ex nomine are for the first time heard of in history. They founded an empire which stretched from the borders of Manchuria to the Carpathians, and commanded also Transoxiana and the country as far as the Indus. Their power south of the Sihun or Jaxartes was sapped and eventually destroyed by the Arabs, who founded the Samani dynasty; but the Turks remained masters of the steppes, and supplied the Samanis, and even the Khalifs, with mercenary troops whose leaders presently supplanted their masters and founded a famous Turkish dynasty at Ghazni, while somewhat later fresh hordes under their own leaders planted themselves in Khorasand and created the splendid empire of the Seljuks, who from the eleventh to the thirteenth century governed the greater part of the Khalifs' dominions in Asia, and advanced the Mohammedan rule into the mountain ranges of Anatolia, and thus prepared the way for the Ottomans, their successors. Poole, Story of Turkey, p. 4.

Turnacum. In ancient geography, a city of northern Gaul, on the site of the modern Tour- nai. See Tournay.

Turner (tér'nér), Charles Tennyson. Born at Sowerby, July 4, 1808; died April 25, 1879. An English poet, brother of Alfred Tennyson.

Turner, Charles Y. Born at Baltimore, Md., Nov. 25, 1850. An American figure-painter. He studied at New York, and with Laurens, Munkacsy, and Bonnat at Paris.

Turner, Joseph Mallord William. Born at London, April 23, 1775; died there, Dec. 19, 1851.

A famous English landscape-painter, the son of a barber in London. His education was meager, but he devoted himself to drawing at a very early age. In 1789 he entered the school of the Royal Academy, and for a short time worked with Sir Joshua Reynolds. In 1790 he exhibited a "View of the Archbishop's Palace, Lambeth," at the Royal Academy. He was made associate of the Royal Academy in 1794, and royal academican in 1802. Before the latter date he was more noted for his water-color painting, the advance in which is largely due to him. Between 1795 and 1799 he sent thirty-nine works to the academy exhibitions. In 1805 he was professor of perspective at the academy. He visited Scotland in 1800, and the Continent about 1802 and in 1804. In 1803 he exhibited six foreign subjects, among them the famous "Calais Pier." From 1806 to 1816 he produced his "Liber Studiorum" (which see), a rival of the "Liber Veritatis" of Claude. After 1797 his work becomes more and more imaginative. In 1813 he commenced the illustrations for Cooke's "Southern Coast." In 1818 he went to Scotland to make the illustrations for Scott's "Provincial Antiquities." In 1819 he visited Italy for the first time. The visit was followed by increased brilliancy of color, as in "The Golden Bough" and "The Fighting Temeraire." In 1819-21 he illustrated Whitaker's "History of Richmondshire," in 1824 "The Rivers of England," in 1830 Rogers's "Italy," and in 1833-35 "The Rivers of France." He developed a new school of engravers. In 1828 he again visited Italy. His first Venetian picture appeared at the academy in 1833. In 1839 he exhibited "The Fighting Temeraire," in 1840 "The Slave Ship," and in 1842 "The Burial of Wilkie at Sea." He continued to exhibit till 1850. His popular fame is due largely to the enthusiastic praise of him in the writings of Ruskin.

Turner, Sharon. Born at London, Sept. 24, 1768; died there, Feb. 13, 1847. An English historian. His chief works are a "History of the Anglo-Saxons" (4 vols. 1799-1805), and a "History of England" (1814-29).

Turnhout (törn'hout). A town in the province of Antwerp, Belgium, 25 miles east by north of Antwerp. Here, Jan. 22, 1597, the Dutch under Maurice of Nassau defeated the Spaniards; and here, Oct. 27, 1789, the Belgians defeated the Austrians. Population, 18,747.

Turnus (tér'nús). In Roman legend, the king of the Rutulians, in Italy, at the period of the arrival of the Trojans under Æneas.

Turpin (tér'pin; F. pron. tür-pän'). Died about 794. An archbishop of Rheims, famous as the erroneously reputed author of a history of Charlemagne which was really composed in the 11th or 12th century.

The chronicle of the pseudo-Turpin is of little real importance in the history of French literature, because it is admitted to have been written in Latin. The busy idleness of critics has, however, prompted them to discuss at great length the question whether the "Chanson de Roland" may not possibly have been composed from this chronicle. The facts are these. Turpin or Turpin was actually archbishop of Rheims from 753-794, but nobody pretends that the chronicle going under his name is authentic. All that is certain is that it is not later than 1165, and that it is probably not earlier than the middle, or at most the beginning, of the eleventh century, while the part of it which is more particularly in question is of the end of that century. "Roland" is almost certainly of the middle at latest. Sainsbury, French Lit., p. 127, note.

Turpin (tér'pin), Dick. A notorious English highwayman who was executed in 1739. The popular account of his famous ride to York on his mare "Black Bess" is not mentioned in the "Newgate Calendar," and in its original form is said to have been written by Magina.

Tusayan, or Tuqayan (tö-sä-yän'), or Tuzan. A confederacy of North American Indian tribes inhabiting the pueblos of Mashongnavi, Oraibi, Shumepovi, Shupaulovi, Sichumovi, Walpi, and Hano, on the summits of four mesas about 50 miles east of the Colorado Chiquito, northeastern Arizona. All the pueblos except Hano are inhabited by a kindred people. This distinct village was built in the latter part of the 17th century by fugitive Tewa Indians (which see) from the Rio Grande valley, New Mexico. The name is derived from Usaya, the Zuni name of the two principal pueblos once inhabited by the Tusayan Confederacy. Hopi or Hopituh is the name by which the tribe calls itself. Also called Cinyumuh, Hapitu, Hoopec, Maqui, Maqui, Mohocce, Mohotze, Moki, Monkey Indians, Opai, Shenoma, Shinuno, and Totontec. (See Shoshonean.) Number (1893), about 2,000.

Tuscan (tus'kan) Archipelago. A group of islands west of Tuscany, including Elba and some smaller islands.

Tuscan Sea. A name sometimes given to the part of the Mediterranean east of Tuscany.

Tuscany (tus'kan-é). [G. Toscana, F. Toscane, from It. Toscana, the Tuscan state, from L. Etruscus, Etruscan.] A compartment of the kingdom of Italy, and former grand duchy, bounded by Liguria, Emilia, the Marches, Umbria, Latium, and the Mediterranean. It comprises the provinces of Florence, Lucca, Massa e Carrara, Pisa, Leghorn, Grosseto, Arezzo, and Siena. It corresponds nearly to the ancient Etruria (see Etruria). It was ruled by the Romans, Goths, Byzantine Greeks, Lombards, and Franks, and after the Frankish conquest constituted a margravate. The celebrated countess Matilda, who reigned from 1076 to 1115, bequeathed her dominions to the popes. Their possession, however, was contested by the emperors of Germany, and in the meanwhile Tuscany became completely disintegrated, various independent republics in addition to Pisa (Florence, Lucca, Siena, etc.) rising to prominence. Florence ultimately absorbed the other republics, and in 1569 her dominions were erected into the grand duchy of Tuscany, under the house of Medici. Tuscany passed from the house of Medici to that of Lorraine in 1737, and became an Austrian "secundogeniture"; was occupied by the French in 1799; was given as the kingdom of Etruria to the house of Parma in 1801; was taken again by the French in 1807, and incorporated with France in 1808; and was restored to the Hapsburg-Lorraine line in 1814. There were revolutionary troubles in 1848-49. The grand duke Leopold II. was obliged to quit the country in 1859, and in 1860 Tuscany was annexed by Victor Emmanuel. Area of compartment, 9,304 square miles. Population (1892), 2,288,747.

Tuscarawas (tus-ka-rä'was) River. A river in northeastern Ohio which unites with the Mohican River at Coshocton to form the Muskingum. Length, about 125 miles.

Tuscarora (tus-ka-rö'rä). [Pl., also Tuscaroras.] A tribe of North American Indians who lived, when first known, upon the Neuse River in North Carolina. In 1711 they rose against the colonists, and after several years of warfare were nearly destroyed; the remainder subsequently joined the Iroquois, forming the sixth tribe of that confederacy, and settling in the territory of the Oneidas in New York. Their name means 'unwilling to be with others,' probably referring to their early separation from the other Iroquois. They number now about 700, about equally divided between New York and Ontario. See Iroquois.

Tuscan Disputations. A work in five books by Cicero, dedicated to M. Brutus, consisting of conversations represented as taking place at Cicero's estate at Tusculum.

Tusculum (tus'kü-lum). In ancient geography, a city of Latium, Italy, situated in the Alban Mountains, 13 miles southeast of Rome, near the modern Frascati. According to tradition its chief, Mamilius, joined Tarquinius Superbus against the Romans. Later it was allied with Rome. Under the republic and empire it contained villas of many Romans (Lucullus, Pompey, Brutus, and Cicero). It was destroyed near the end of the 12th century. Its ruins contain a Roman amphitheater and a theater. The interior of the former is reticulated masonry; the seats are supported on vaulting of brickwork. The axes of the outer ellipse are 230 and 171 feet; of the arena, 157 and 95 feet. The latter is in excellent preservation. There are 15 tiers of seats, divided by radial stairways into 4 cunei; there are three main entrances. The orchestra remains perfect, and there is much of the stage structure.

Tuscumbia (tus-kum'bi-ä). The capital of Colbert County, Alabama, situated near the Tennessee 5 miles south of Florence. Population (1900), 2,348.

Tussaud's (tü-söz'), Madame, Waxworks. A collection of waxworks representing notable persons, and various curiosities, on the Marylebone Road, London, near Baker street station. It was established by Madame Marie Gresholtz Tussaud, a Swiss, in 1802; she died in 1850. She learned to model in Paris, and after an imprisonment during the Revolution brought her collection to London. Many of the figures now on exhibition were modeled by her. There is also a "Chamber of Horrors," with casts, relics, etc., of executed criminals.

Tusser (tus'ér), Thomas. Born at Rivenhall, Essex, about 1527; died at London about April, 1580. An English poet. He was a chorister of St. Paul's; studied at Eton and at King's College, Cambridge; spent ten years at court; and then settled on a farm in Suffolk. He wrote "A Hundred Good Points of Good Husbandry" (1557), "Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry United to as Many of Good Wifery" (1573), etc.

Tutivillus (tü-ti-vil'us). A demon who was said to collect all the fragments of words which the priests had skipped over or mutilated in the performance of the service, and to carry them to hell. Hallivell.

Tuttlingen (tut'ling-en). A town in the Black Forest circle, Württemberg, situated on the Danube 29 miles northwest of Constance. It has manufactures of shoes, knives, surgical instruments, etc. Here, 1643, the Imperialists and Bavarians defeated the French. Population (1890), 9,780.

Tutuila. The third in importance of the Samoan Islands. It contains the harbor of Pango-Pango. It belongs to the United States. Length, 17 miles. Area, 55 square miles.

Tuxedo (tuk-sö'dö) Club. A fashionable club, having its house at Tuxedo Park, New York, and a membership of 400 non-residents.

Tuxedo Park (tuk-sö'dö pärk). A fashionable settlement in Orange County, New York, 35 miles north-northwest of New York city.

Tvashtri (twash'tri). [Skt., 'the Shaper,' from \sqrt{tvaksh} , work, hew, fashion.] In the later Hindu mythology, one of the Adityas, but in the Rig-veda the Hephaestus or Vulcan of the Indian pantheon, the ideal artist, the divine artisan. He sharpens the iron ax of Brahmanspati and forges the thunderbolts of Indra, which are golden, or of iron with a thousand points and a hundred edges. He bestows offspring and forms husband and wife for each other, even from the womb. All worlds or beings are his. He is in several passages connected with the Ribhus, who, like him, are skilful workmen. His daughter is Saranyu, whom he gives in marriage to Vivasvat, and to whom she bears the Ashvins, and Yama and Yami, the primeval pair.

Tver (tvär). 1. A government of Russia, surrounded by the governments of Novgorod, Yaroslavl, Vladimir, Moscow, Smolensk, and Pskoff. Area, 25,225 square miles. Population, 1,791,000.—2. Tweed (twéd). A river in Scotland and on the boundary between Scotland and England. It rises in Peeblesshire; traverses Peebles, Selkirk, and Roxburgh; forms the boundary between Berwick and Northumberland; and enters the North Sea at Berwick. Among its tributaries are the Ettrick, Teviot, Till, Gala, Leader, Eden, Leet, and Whiteadder. On it are Peebles, Abbotsford, Melrose, Dryburgh Abbey, Kelso, Norham Castle, etc. Length, 97 miles.

Tweed, William Marcy. Born at New York, April 3, 1823; died there, April 12, 1878. A Democratic politician and notorious criminal. He was the son of a chair-maker, and learned his father's trade. In 1852 he became an alderman; served in Congress 1853-55; was chairman of the board of supervisors of New York city 1856, and school commissioner 1856-57; was State senator 1867-71 (re-elected in the latter year); and was appointed commissioner of public works for the city in 1870. He became chairman of the general committee of Tammany Hall and grand sachem in 1863. As the head of a group of influential politicians (Connolly, Sweeney, Hall, and others), known as the "Tweed Ring," he succeeded in getting control of the financial affairs of the city, and in robbing it of many millions of dollars. He was arrested in a civil suit Oct. 28, 1871, and in a criminal action in December; was tried in Jan., 1873, and the jury disagreeing, was again tried in November and sentenced to 12 years' imprisonment; was released on legal technicalities in 1875, but was committed to Ludlow street jail in default of bail in civil suits; escaped and fled to Spain; was arrested by the Spanish authorities and returned to the United States; and was recommitted to Ludlow street jail, where he died.

Tweed Ring. See Tweed, William Marcy.

Tweedledum and Tweedledee. A phrase in a satirical squib by Byrom (1692-1763) alluding to the differences between the adherents of Handel and of Buononcini. See Handel.

Twelfth Night, or What You Will. A comedy by Shakspeare, first acted in 1602 and printed in 1623.

The critics all agree that some outlines of the serious portion of "Twelfth Night" were drawn, directly or indirectly, from the Italian of Bandello. Several intermediate sources have been pointed out, to which the poet may have gone; and among them the English of Barnabe Rich and the French of Belleforest, either of which might well enough have been the true one. Besides these, two Italian plays have lately been discovered, severally entitled "G' Inguanni" and "G' Inguannati," both also founded upon Bandello, though differing considerably from each other. Hudson, Int. to Twelfth Night.

Twelve Tables. The tables on which were engraved and promulgated in Rome (451 and 450 B. C.) short statements of those rules of Roman law which were most important in the affairs of daily life. They were drawn up, in large part, it seems, from the existing law, and in part as new legislation, by the decemvirs, and hence were at first called "the laws of the decemvirs." Ten were first promulgated, and two were soon added. They formed thereafter the principal basis or source of the Roman jurisprudence.

Twenty-four Parganas (pir-gä'näz). A district in Bengal, British India, in the immediate vicinity of Calcutta. Area, 2,124 square miles. Population (1881), 1,863,859, excluding Calcutta.

Two Drovers, The. A novel by Sir Walter Scott, one of the "Chronicles of the Canongate," published in 1827.

Two Foscari (fos'kä-rē), The. A tragedy by Lord Byron.

Two Gentlemen of Verona, The. A comedy by Shakspeare (the date of production is uncertain; variously stated to be 1591 and 1595), printed in 1623. Fleay thinks the play was produced in 1591 with work by a different hand in it, which was cut out and replaced by Shakspeare's own in 1595. Parts of the story are identical with that of the shepherdess Philomena in Montemayor's "Diana," translated in manuscript by Young, about 1553, and with Bandello's "Apollonius and Syla."

Two Noble Kinsmen, The. A play produced in 1625 and published in 1634 as by Fletcher and Shakspeare. It is not now supposed that Shakspeare had any hand in it, but Massinger and Rowley are thought to have worked with Fletcher. Fleay suggests Beaumont with Fletcher. The story is that of Palamon and Arcite.

Two Sicilies (sis'i-liz), Kingdom of the. The united kingdom of Sicily and southern Italy. The latter, when separate, is called Sicily on this side the Faro (or Capo del Faro, the northeastern promontory of Sicily), or the kingdom of Naples. The kingdom comprised (besides the island of Sicily), Abruzzi and Molise, Apulia, Campania, Basilicata, and Calabria. The principal periods of union have been the 12th and 13th centuries (under the Normans, Hohenstaufens, and Charles of Anjou), 1503-1713, 1713-1806, and 1815-60. Naples was under Joseph Bonaparte 1806-08, and under Murat 1808-15. See further under Sicily.

Tyler (ti'lēr). The capital of Smith County, Texas, 115 miles east by south of Fort Worth. Population (1900), 8,069.

Tyler, John. Born at Greenway, Charles City County, Va., March 29, 1790; died at Richmond, Va., Jan. 18, 1862. The tenth President of the United States. He was educated at William and Mary College; was admitted to the bar in 1809; was member of the Virginia legislature 1811-16; volunteered for the defense of Richmond in 1813; was member of Congress from Virginia 1816-21; was a member of the legislature 1823-25; was governor of Virginia 1825-27; and was United States senator from Virginia 1827-36. He opposed the tariff, the bank, and the Force Bill; and resigned in Feb., 1836, from unwillingness to obey instructions of the Virginia legislature to vote for the "expunging resolution" (which see). He received 47 electoral votes in 1836 as candidate of the "State-rights Whigs" for Vice-President; was reelected to the Virginia legislature in 1838; and was nominated by the Whigs as candidate for Vice-President in Dec., 1839, and elected in 1840. By the death of President Harrison, he became President April 4, 1841. Among the leading events of his administration were the quarrel with the Whig leaders; the veto of the fiscal bank bills in 1841, notwithstanding the resignation of nearly all the cabinet in Sept., 1841; veto of the protective bill in 1842; the Ashburton treaty; and the annexation of Texas. He was nominated for President by a Democratic convention in 1844, but soon withdrew. He was made peace commissioner by President Buchanan in 1861; was president of the peace convention in Feb., 1861; favored secession in Virginia; and became a member of the Confederate provisional congress.

Tyler, Moses Coit. Born Aug. 2, 1835; died Dec. 28, 1900. An American scholar, professor of English at the University of Michigan 1867-1881, and of American history at Cornell from 1881. Among his works are "History of American Literature" (1878), "A Manual of English Literature" (1879), "Life of Patrick Henry" (1887).

Tyler, Wat (Walter the Tyler). Killed at Smithfield, June 15, 1381. The leader of a revolt of peasants of England in 1381. He is said to have killed a tax-gatherer who insulted his daughter, and with Jack Straw to have led the men of Kent and Essex to London. While treating with Richard II. at Smithfield, he was killed by Lord Mayor Walworth.

Tyler (ti'lör), Edward Burnett. Born at Camberwell, Oct. 2, 1832. A noted English anthropologist. He was educated at the Friends' School, Grove House, Tottenham; undertook with Henry Christy a scientific journey through Mexico in 1856; was appointed keeper of the Oxford University Museum in 1883, and reader (1883) and professor (1896) in anthropology; was nominated Gifford lecturer at Aberdeen in 1888; and was president of the Anthropological Institute 1891-92. His works include "Anahuac, or Mexico and the Mexicans" (1861), "Researches into the History of Mankind" (1865), "Primitive Culture" (1871), and "Anthropology" (1881).

Tyndale, or Tindale (tin'dal), William. Born in Gloucestershire, England, about 1484; executed at Vilvorde, near Brussels, Oct. 6, 1536. An English reformer, and translator of the Bible. He studied at Oxford and Cambridge; was ordained priest about 1521; and was for a time chaplain and domestic tutor in the family of Sir John Walsh, Little Sodbury, Gloucestershire. Having exposed himself to persecution on account of his professions of sympathy with the new learning, he left England for the Continent in 1524, and after a visit to Luther at Wittenberg settled at Cologne, whence, however, he was presently expelled. He took refuge in Worms, where he published his octavo edition of the New Testament in 1526. His translation of the Pentateuch appeared at Marburg in 1530. His movements between 1526 and 1530 are uncertain; after 1530 he lived chiefly at Antwerp. He was arrested at the instance of Henry VIII., May 24, 1535; was imprisoned in the castle of Vilvorde, near Brussels; and after a protracted trial for heresy was strangled, Oct. 6, 1536, his body being burned at the stake. Among his other works are "Parable of the Wicked Mammon" (1527), "Obedience of a Christian Man" (1528), and "Practice of Prelates" (1530).

Tyndall (tin'dal), John. Born at Leighlin Bridge, Ireland, Aug. 21, 1820; died at Haslemere, Surrey, England, Dec. 4, 1893. A distinguished British physicist. Having been educated partly at home, partly at a school near his native town of Leighlin Bridge, he entered the employment of a firm of engineers in 1844. He was teacher at Queenwood College, Hants, 1847-48; studied at the University of Marburg 1848-51; was elected fellow of the Royal Society in 1852; became professor of natural philosophy at the Royal Institution of London in 1853; explored with Huxley the glaciers of Switzerland in 1856, thus beginning a study to which he afterward devoted much attention; climbed the Weisshorn in 1861; scaled the Matterhorn in 1868; visited Algeria in 1870; and lectured in the United States in 1872. He was especially noted for his investigations in electricity and magnetism, radiant heat, light, acoustics, and glaciers. He was a zealous advocate of the doctrine of materialism, which he upheld in an address delivered while presiding over a meeting of the British Association at Belfast in 1874. His works are "Faraday as a Discoverer" (1868), "Researches on Diamagnetism and Magneto-Crystalline Action" (1870), "Notes of a Course of Nine Lectures on Light delivered at the Royal Institution, 1869" (1870), "Notes of a Course of Seven Lectures on Electrical Phenomena delivered at the Royal Institution, 1870" (1870), "Essays on the Imagination in Science" (1870), "Hours of Exercise in the Alps" (1871), "Fragments of Science for Unscientific People" (1871), "Contributions to Molecular Physics in the Domain of Radiant Heat: a Series of Memoirs" (1872), "The Forms of Water in Clouds and Rivers, Ice and Glaciers" (1872), "Six Lectures on Light, delivered in America, 1872-73" (1873), "Address delivered before the British Association assembled at Belfast: with Additions" (1874), "On the Transmission of Sound by the Atmosphere" (1874), "Lessons in Electricity at the Royal Institution, 1875-76" (1876), "Fermentation" (1877), "Essays on the Floating Matter of the Air in Relation to Putrefaction and Infection" (1881), "Free Molecules and Radiant Heat" ("Philosophical Transactions"; 1882), "Fragments of Science" and "New Fragments" (1892), etc.

Tyr (tir). [ON. Týr.] In Northern mythology, the god of war and victory, son of Odin. He is the same as the Anglo-Saxon Tiw. He is represented with one hand, the other having been bitten off by the wolf Fenris, in whose mouth he had placed it as a pledge.

Tyrannic Love, or the Royal Martyr. A tragedy by Dryden, produced in 1668 or 1669, printed in 1670.

Tyras (ti'ras). The ancient name of the river Dniester.

Tyre (tir). [L. Tyrrus, Gr. Τίρος, from Phen. (Heb.) Tsor (gor, modern çur), rock.] Next to Sidon, the oldest and most important city of Phœnicia. It consisted of a town on the mainland, which was the oldest part (Palætyrus), and two rocky islands directly opposite Palætyrus. These islands originally contained only the temple of Melkart and warehouses. In the 13th century B. C. they were more settled, and they were united by Hiram, the contemporary of Solomon, by an embankment. In the 11th century B. C. Tyre began, under its first king, Abibaal, father of Hiram, to rival its mother city Sidon, and soon supplanted it as queen of the Phœnician cities. Of its magnificence and luxury the prophet Ezekiel gives a detailed and graphic description. It established colonies in Sicily, Sardinia, Spain, Africa (Carthage), and sent out mercantile fleets to India and Brittany. Under Hiram Tyre reached the height of its prosperity and splendor. It then came into close friendly relations with Israel. Later, Ahab, king of Israel, married Jezebel, daughter of Ethbaal, whose great-granddaughter Elissa (Dido) is said to have founded Carthage. Tyre was often the aim of attacks by Eastern rulers. It became tributary to Assyria under Tiglath-Pileser III. (745-727 B. C.). Salmanser IV. (727-722) besieged it for five years, apparently without success. Under Nebuchadnezzar it stood a siege of 13 years (555-572). Later it came under Persian supremacy. Alexander the Great reduced the city after a siege of nine months, though he did not completely destroy it. From this blow Tyre never fully recovered, but continued to flourish in a quiet manner through its manufactures of metal-work, fine textiles, and purple dye. In the Roman period Tyre was still a prosperous city, and it retained some importance down to the middle ages. During the Crusades it often changed hands between the Christians and the Mohammedans, and was repeatedly destroyed. The modern Cur is an unimportant town under the government of Beirut, with about 5,000 inhabitants.

Tyrian Cynosure. The constellation Ursa Minor, anciently called the Cynosure, which served as a guide to the Tyrians in their long voyages.

Tyrol (tir'ol; G. pron. të-röl'), or Tirol, sometimes the Tyrol, It. Tirolo (të-rō'lo). A county in Austria-Hungary which forms with Vorarlberg a crownland in the Cisleithan division of the Austrian empire. Capital, Innsbruck. Tyrol itself is bounded by Vorarlberg, Bavaria, Salzburg, Carinthia, Italy, and Switzerland. It is traversed by the Alps, and contains the upper valleys of the Lech, Adige, and Drave, and the middle valley of the Inn. Among its chief products are dairy products, fruits, and wine (in South Tyrol). It has mines of coal, iron, lead, zinc, copper, etc. The prevailing religion is Roman Catholic; most of the inhabitants are Germans, but there are also about 15,000 Ladins, and in South Tyrol over one third of the population is Italian. It has 21 representatives in the Austrian Reichsrat, and 68 members in its Landtag. Tyrol was part of the ancient Rhetia and Noricum under the Roman Empire, and later in great part a portion of Bavaria. It belonged to the empire of Charles the Great, and later to the duchy of Bavaria. The counts of Tyrol extended their power from the neighborhood of Meran in the middle ages, and became paramount in the country. Tyrol passed to the house of Hapsburg in 1303, and was granted by Napoleon to Bavaria in 1805. In 1809 occurred an insurrection against the French and Bavarian rule. Parts of Tyrol were ceded to France in 1809-10. It was recovered by Austria in 1814. Area, with Vorarlberg, 11,324 square miles. Population (1890), 928,769.

Tyrol, Welsch. That part of Tyrol not inhabited principally by German-speaking people; specifically, South Tyrol, inhabited principally by Italians.

Tyrone (ti-rōn'). A county in Ulster, Ireland, bounded by Donegal, Londonderry, Lough Neagh, Armagh, Monaghan, and Fermanagh. Capital, Omagh. The surface is generally hilly. Area, 1,260 square miles. Population (1891), 171,278.

Tyrtæus (tēr-tē'us). [Gr. Τυρταίος.] Lived in the middle of the 7th century B. C. A famous elegiac poet of Sparta, said to have been a native of Attica. According to a (doubtless unfounded) tradition, the Spartans who were at war with the Messenians were commanded by the oracle to take a leader from among the Athenians. The latter, not wishing to aid the Spartans, sent Tyrtæus, a lame schoolmaster of no reputation; but by his songs he so inspired his followers that they obtained the victory. Fragments of his poems are extant.

Tyrus (ti'rūs). The Latin name of Tyre.

Tyrwhitt (ter'it). Thomas. Born at London, March 29, 1730; died at London, Aug. 15, 1786.

An English critic. He studied at Oxford, and was elected a fellow of Merton in 1755, but in 1762 abandoned his academic career in order to become clerk of the House of Commons. He resigned his clerkship in 1768, and devoted himself to literature. He wrote "Observations on Some Passages of Shakespeare" (1766), and prepared excellent editions of Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales" (1775-78) and Aristotle's "Poetics" (1794). He is chiefly known as the original editor of "Rowley's Poems," which he demonstrated were written by Chatterton.

Uhland (ö'länd), Ludwig. Born at Tübingen, April 26, 1787; died there, Nov. 13, 1862. A German lyric poet. He studied jurisprudence at Tübingen, and afterward became an advocate at Stuttgart. He subsequently devoted himself to linguistic studies. In 1810 he was in Paris engaged in study, particularly of manuscripts of the middle ages. In 1829 he was made professor of the German language and literature at Tübingen, a post which he resigned in 1833 on the refusal of the government to grant him a leave of absence to attend the Diet of Wurtemberg as delegate. In 1848 and 1849 he was a member of the German National Assembly. His first poems ("Gedichte") appeared in 1806; a complete collection was published in 1815. "Vaterländische Gedichte" ("Fatherland Poems"), a volume of patriotic lyrics evoked by the Wurtemberg constitutional troubles of 1815, was published in 1816, and in an augmented edition in 1817. In 1818 appeared the first of his two dramas, the tragedy "Ernst Herzog von Schwaben" ("Ernst, Duke of Swabia"), which was followed in 1819 by "Ludwig der Baier" ("Louis the Bavarian"). His fame as a poet is based chiefly upon his songs and ballads, some of which are among the most famous in German literature. Several of his lyrics, like "Ich hatt' einen Kameraden," "Droben stehet die Kapelle," and "Es zogen drei Burschen wohl über den Rhein," and the religious poem "Das ist der Tag des Herrn" have become genuine folk-songs. As a poet he belonged to the so-called Swabian School. His poems and dramas ("Gedichte und Dramen") were published at Stuttgart in 1876, in 3 vols. His "Schriften zur Geschichte der Dichtung und Sage" ("Writings on the History of Poetry and Legend") appeared at Stuttgart, 1865-73, in 8 vols.

Uhrich (ö'rich or ü-rök'), Jean Jacques Alexis. Born at Pfalzburg, Alsace, Feb. 15, 1802; died at Passy, Oct. 9, 1886. A French general. He served in Spain, Algeria, the Crimea, and Italy; and was commandant of Strasburg at the time of its siege and capitulation in 1870.

Uigurs (wē'görz). A Turkish people dwelling in central Asia, especially in the Tian-Shan region. Also Uighurs.

The Uighurs eventually, . . . under the names of Yuchchi and White Huns, broke in pieces the Greek kingdom of Bactria, and founded a famous empire, with its capital at Balkh, which became the scourge of the Sassanians on the one hand, and filled a more remarkable place in Indian history than is generally suspected on the other.

—Poole, Story of Turkey, p. 3.

Uintah, or Uinta (ü-in'tij), Mountains. A range of mountains chiefly in northern Utah, on the borders of Colorado and Wyoming. It extends nearly east and west.

Uiracocha (wē-rä-kō'chä). [Quichna: perhaps from Uayra, air, spirit, and cocha, sea, space.] The Supreme Deity of the ancient Peruvians. He was described as the creator of all living things. His worship had come down from very ancient times, and was attributed to the people who had ruled about Lake Titicaca (see Piruas). He was adored, at least by the amautas, or wise men, and temples were dedicated to him (see Curicaneha). The festival of Ccapac Rayni, in the middle of the year, was held in his honor. The early Spanish writers corrupted the name to Viracocha and mistranslated it "foam of the sea." Uiracocha was sometimes represented as white and bearded, whence the Indians are said to have applied the name to the Spaniards. For the same reason the missionaries supposed him to be identical with the Mexican Quetzalcohuatl (which see), and imagined that the traditions of him referred to St. Thomas. Also called Illu-ticzi ("eternal light"), Pachayachachic ("teacher"), and Pachacamac ("ruler of the world").

Ukraine (ú'krän or ó-krän'). [Russ. Ukráina, border land.] A region in Russia, of vague boundaries, lying chiefly in the valley of the middle Dnieper; nearly the same as Little Russia, and corresponding nearly to the governments Kieff, Tchernigoff, Pultowa, and Khar-koff. It was long an object of contention between Poland and Russia. The part east of the Dnieper was ceded to Russia by Poland in 1667 and 1686; the part west of the Dnieper fell to Russia in 1793.

Uleåborg (ó'le-å-borg). 1. A laen of Finland, occupying the northern part of that country. Area, 63,971 square miles. Population, 246,993. —2. A seaport, capital of the laen of Uleåborg, situated at the mouth of the Uleå-Elf in the Gulf of Bothnia, in lat. 65° N., long. 25° 30' E. It has considerable foreign commerce. Population, 10,589.

Uleå Lake (ó'le-å-lák). A lake in Finland, southeast of Uleåborg. Length, about 40 miles.

Ulfilas (ul'fi-las), Goth. Wulfila ('little wolf'). Born 311; died at Constantinople in 381. A Gothic bishop and translator of the Bible. His parents were Christians of Cappadocian origin. At the Synod of Antioch, 341, he was consecrated bishop of the Arian Visigoths, who lived to the north of the lower Danube. In 348, persecuted and driven out of this region by Athanarich, Ulfilas and his people, with the permission of the emperor Constantius, emigrated to Mesia, in the neighborhood of Nicopolis. From their new home they are consequently frequently called Mesogoths and their language Mesogothic. Ulfilas died at Constantinople, where he had gone to defend the doctrines of Arianism. He preached in Greek, Latin, and Gothic. He translated the Bible into Gothic from a Greek original, but is said to have omitted the Books of Kings. For his translation he invented a written alphabet by supplementing the Greek alphabet in necessary instances from the Gothic runes. His translation, which from internal evidence shows the work of several hands, and was, doubtless, in part done by others under his supervision, has been preserved only in a fragmentary form: in all there are the greater part of the Gospels, a large portion of the Epistles, and scraps of the Old Testament. The principal manuscript is the so-called Codex Argenteus of the University Library at Upsala, Sweden, which is written in silver characters on a purple ground. Fragments of other manuscripts are preserved at Wolfenbüttel, Germany, and at Milan and Turin. The Gothic translation of the Bible is the oldest extant literary monument in the Germanic languages. It has been many times published. A recent edition is by E. Bernhardt ("Wulfila oder die Gotische Bibel," Halle, 1875).

The grammar of the Gothic tongue, as exhibited in the translation of Ulfilas, is, it need hardly be said, of priceless value in the history of human speech. We here see, not indeed the original of all the Teutonic languages, but a specimen of one of them three centuries earlier than any other that has been preserved, with many inflections which have since been lost, with words which give us the clue to relationships otherwise untraceable, with phrases which cast a strong light on the fresh and joyous youth of the Teutonic peoples. In short, it is not too much to say that the same place which the study of Sæsserit holds in the history of the development of the great Indo-European family of nations is occupied by the Gothic of Ulfilas (Moeso-Gothic, as it is sometimes not very happily named) in reference to the unwritten history of the Germanic races.

Ullmann (ól'män), Karl. Born at Eppenhach, near Heidelberg, March 15, 1796; died at Karlsruhe, Baden, Jan. 12, 1865. A German Protestant evangelical theologian. His works include "Reformatoren vor der Reformation" ("Reformers before the Reformation," 1841), "Über die Sündlosigkeit Christi" ("On the Sinlessness of Christ," 1841), "Das Wesen des Christentums" (1845), and a reply to Strauss's "Life of Jesus," entitled "Historisch oder mythisch?"

Ulloa (ól-yó'ä), Antonio de. Born at Seville, Jan. 12, 1716; died near Cadiz, July 3, 1795. A Spanish naval officer. In 1735 he was chosen, with Jorge Juan, another young naval officer, to accompany to Peru the French commission for the measurement of an arc of the meridian. (See Condamine.) While there they studied the natural features and political condition of the colony, and were also employed in defending it against Lord Anson. During his return voyage in 1744-45, Ulloa was captured by the English, but soon released. Charles III. gave him high naval and civil offices, including the governorship of Louisiana (1766-68), but he showed little aptitude for command, and after 1780 was not in active service. He founded the observatory at Cadiz and the first Spanish metallurgical laboratory, and was prominent in other scientific enterprises. He published "Relacion histórica del viaje a la América meridional" (with Juan: 2 vols., 1748, translated into various languages), "Noticias Americanas" (1772), etc. The secret report of Juan and Ulloa on the American colonies was published in English in 1826; it is important as showing the causes which led to the war for independence.

Ulloa, Francisco de. Died in 1540 (?). A Spanish captain. He was with Cortés in the conquest of Mexico, and in July, 1539, was sent by him to explore the Gulf of California. He left Acapulco with three vessels, one of which was lost in a storm; with the others he ascended to the head of the gulf, subsequently exploring the western coast of the peninsula, and attaining about lat. 28°, or, as some assert, lat. 30° 30' N. One account says that he was lost at sea; another that he was assassinated shortly after his return to Acapulco. Ulloa was the first to prove that Lower California was a peninsula.

Ullswater, or Ulleswater (ulz'wá'tér). A lake on the border between Cumberland and Westmoreland, England, 20 miles south of Carlisle; the second in size of the English lakes. Its outlet is the Eamont into the Eden. Length, 9 miles.

Ulm (ölm). The chief town of the Danube circle of Würtemberg, and an imperial fortress, situated at the junction of the Iller and Blau with the Danube, in lat. 48° 24' N., long. 9° 59' E.

It is an important strategic and railway center; has active trade in leather, wood, cloth, etc.; has manufactures of beer, pipe-bowls, metal-work, hats, etc.; and is noted for its vegetables. Its cathedral, the largest church in Germany except the cathedral of Cologne, was begun in 1377, and finished early in the 16th century. The west front has a splendid triple portal surmounted by a rich tower terminating in an octagon and a spire 529 feet high, completed in 1890, and forming the loftiest structure of its kind. The interior has double aisles, and much fine chancery furniture. The 15th-century choir-stalls of oak are covered with remarkable figure-sculpture, illustrating paganism, Judaism, and Christianity. There is some beautiful glass. The cathedral measures 420 by 165 feet; height of nave vault, 141. Ulm was a free imperial city; was one of the chief places in Swabia, and a leading member of the Swabian leagues; joined the Reformation in 1530; and passed to Bavaria in 1803, and to Würtemberg in 1810. Population (1890), 36,191.

Ulm, Capitulation of. The surrender of an Austrian army (about 25,000-30,000) under Mack to Napoleon, Oct. 17, 1805.

Ulm, Truce of. A truce concluded in 1647 between the Franco-Swedish forces and the Bavarians.

Ulpian (ul'pi-an). L. Ulpianus (ul-pi-ä'nus), Domitius. Murdered about 228 A. D. A celebrated Roman jurist, of Phœnician descent. He held office from the time of Septimius Severus; was banished by Elagabalus; and was pretorian prefect under Alexander Severus. He wrote many commentaries and other legal works ("Ad Edictum," "Ad Sabinum," etc.), largely used in the "Digest." Fragments of his "Institutiones" were published by Endlicher in 1835.

Although Ulpian's chief merit lies rather in the collection of very voluminous materials than in the well-balanced arrangement of the same, his works enjoyed for a long time high authority on account of their rich contents, and likewise in virtue of their pertinent criticism and clear style. In Justinian's Digest the extracts from his works form a full third of the whole work.

Ulrich (öl'rich). Born 1487; died 1550. Duke of Würtemberg, son of Heinrich IV. He succeeded to the duchy in 1498; was expelled by the Swabian League in 1519; was restored with the aid of Philip of Hesse in 1534, and joined the Smalkaldic League.

Ulrich von Hutten. See Hutten.

Ulrich von Lichtenstein (öl'rich fon lièh'ten-stin). Born about 1200; died 1276. A Middle High German lyric poet. He was descended from a noble family in Styria. His principal poem is his autobiography called "Frauenlied" ("Service of Ladies"), containing his loves and adventures from 1222 to 1255, in which year it was written. His other work, "Frauenbuch" ("Book of Ladies"), from 1257, is descriptive of the morals of his time. His works were published by Karl Schumann (Berlin, 1841).

Ulrici (öl-rét'sé), Hermann. Born at Pforten, Prussia, March 23, 1806; died at Halle, Prussia, Jan. 11, 1884. A German theistic philosopher and critic, professor at Halle. His works include "Über Shakspeare's dramatische Kunst" ("On Shakspeare's Dramatic Art," 1830), "Geschichte der hellenischen Dichtkunst" (1835), "Über Prinzip und Methode der Hegeleschen Philosophie" (1841), "Grundprinzip der Philosophie" (1845), "System der Logik" (1852), "Glauben und Wissen" (1858), "Gott und die Natur" (1862), "Gott und der Mensch" (1866), etc.

Ulrike Eleonore (öl-ré'ke-el-e-ö-nó're). Born at Stockholm, Jan. 23, 1688; died Nov. 24, 1741. Queen of Sweden, younger sister of Charles XII. She married the hereditary prince Frederick of Hesse-Cassel, and was proclaimed queen in 1718. Her husband was crowned as reigning king in 1720.

Ulster (ul'stér). [ME. Ullister, Uleister, Ulsister, Ir. Uladh, with termination as in Leinster, Munster.] The northernmost of the four great divisions of Ireland, bounded by the Atlantic Ocean, North Channel, Irish Sea, Leinster, and Connaught. It contains the counties Donegal, Londonderry, Tyrone, Antrim, Down, Armagh, Monaghan, Cavan, and Fermanagh. It was early colonized by Scots; was long ruled by kings; and in recent times has been a Protestant and loyalist stronghold. Population (1891), 1,619,814.

Ulster, Settlement or Plantation of. The colonization of a large part of Ulster with English and Scottish settlers, about 1609-11.

Ulster Rebellion. An outbreak of the Irish in Ulster against the English colonists in 1641.

Ultramontane (ul-trí-mon'tán) Party. [From

L. ultra, beyond, and montanus, of or pertaining to a mountain.] In German politics, the Center party, which opposes legislation supposed to be inimical to the Church of Rome.

Ulugh Beg (ó'lúgh beg) or Beigh. Lived in the middle of the 15th century. A prince of Samarkand, grandson of Timur: noted as an astronomer. His tables, which were published by Hyde in 1665, are referred to as important authority by modern astronomers.

Ulundi (ó-lón'dé). A place in Zululand, South Africa, about lat. 28° 10' S., where, in 1879, the British under Lord Chelmsford defeated the Zulus under Cetlawayo.

Ulva (ul'vü). An island of the Inner Hebrides, Scotland, west of Mull. Length, about 5 miles.

Ulverston (ul'vér-ston). A town in Lancashire, England, situated near Morecambe Bay 16 miles northwest of Lancaster; once the chief town in Furness. It has various manufactures and mines of hematite. Population (1891), 9,948.

Umbria (um'bri-ä). [L. Umbria, Gr. ἡ γῆ ἢ χώρα Ὀμβρῖκῶν or Ὀμβρική, from Umbri, Gr. Ὀμβροί, Ὀμβροί, or Ὀμβρικοί, the inhabitants.] In ancient geography, a region in Italy, situated east of Etruria and west of Picenum. The Umbrians took part in the second Samnite war, but were defeated by Rome in 308 B. C. After the third Samnite war they were gradually Romanized. Modern Umbria is a compartment of the kingdom of Italy. It contains the province Perugia.

The Umbria of Herodotus, as Niebuhr observes (Hist. of Rome, vol. I, p. 142 E. T.), "is of large and indefinite extent." It appears to include almost the whole of Northern Italy. It is from the region above the Umbrians that the Alps and the Arpis flow into the Danube (iv. 49). This would seem to assign to them the modern Lombardo-Venetian kingdom, and to place them on the Adriatic. The arrival of the Tyrrhenians on their shores extends them to the opposite coast, and makes Tuscany also a part of their country. Herodotus knows of no Italian nations except the Tyrrhenians, the Umbrians, the Venetians (Veneti), the Enotrians, and the Messapians.

Racineum, Herod., I, 223, note.

Umbriel (um'bri-el). [Formed from L. umbra, shade, and -iel as in Friel, Gabriel.] A dusky sprite in Pope's "Rape of the Lock."

Umbriel. The second satellite of Uranus, discovered by Herschel in 1787.

Umbundu (öm-bün'dó). The language of the Ovimbundu (sing. Oehimbundu), who are settled between Benguela (Bangela), West Africa, and the Kuango River, due east. The two principal tribes are those of Bailundo (Ombalundu) and Ilhe (Oviye). As these people are traveling traders who have opened the Zambezi valley, Katanga, Unia, and Lubuku to the commerce of Benguela, the language is understood far beyond its tribal territory. In structure it belongs to the same cluster as Ndonga and Herero. It should not be confounded with Kimbundu (which see). American missionaries are developing a native Christian literature.

Umeå-Elf (ó'me-ä elf). A river in Sweden which flows into the Gulf of Bothnia near Umeå; the outlet of various lakes, including Stor Uman. Length, 261 miles.

Umerapoorá. See Amarapura.

Umon (ó-món'). An African town, built on an island in the Oyono or Old Kalabar River, West Africa, about 70 miles from its mouth. It is an important market where the tribes of the upper river come to barter their produce for European goods brought up by the Elik traders of the coast. Population, about 8,000.

Umpqua (ump'kwá). A river in Oregon which flows into the Pacific Ocean about lat. 43° 40' N. Length, about 180 miles.

Umritsir. See Afritsar.

Una (ü'ni). [L. fem. of unus, one.] "A lovely ladie," the personification of truth, in Spenser's "Faerie Queene." She is ultimately united to St. George, the Red Cross Knight, who has slain the dragon in her behalf. In her wanderings she is followed by a lion who has been tamed by her gentleness and purity.

Unaka (ü'na-ki) Mountains. A range of mountains on the border between North Carolina and Tennessee: a continuation of the Great Smoky Mountains, or identical with them.

Unakhotana (un'ä-öhö-tä'nä), or Yukonikhotana (yö-kon'ë-öhö-tä'nä). [The first name means 'distant people'; the second, 'people of the Yukon.'] A tribe of the northern group of the Athapascan stock of North American Indians, living in several villages along the Yukon River, between the Sunkakat River and the Tananah River, Alaska. See Athapascan.

Unao (ö'na-ö). A district in Oudh, British India, situated east of Cawnpore. Area, 1,778 square miles. Population (1891), 953,636.

Unas. See Mastabat-el-Faraun.

Uncas (ung'kas). Died about 1682. An Indian chief, a Pequot by birth. He revolted from the Pequots and became chief of the Mohegans; joined the English in the Pequot war; and defeated the Narragansets under Miantonomoh in 1643. Cooper introduces a character Uncas in his "Last of the Mohicans."

Uncle Esek (ung'kl ö'zek). The pseudonym of Henry W. Shaw.

Uncle Remus. See Remus, Uncle.

Uncle Sam (sam). The government of the people of the United States; a jocular extension of the initials U. S.

Uncle Tom's Cabin. A novel by Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe, published in book form in 1852. It was directed against negro slavery in the Southern States. The scene is laid chiefly in Kentucky and Louisiana. It has appeared in numerous editions and translations.

It came out as a sort of feuilleton in the "National Era," a Washington paper. The death of Uncle Tom was the first portion published, indeed the first that was written. It appeared in the summer of 1851, and excited so much attention that Mrs. Stowe added a beginning and middle to her end, by composing and printing from week to week the story as we now have it, until it was concluded in March, 1852. Before the end of 1852 it had been translated into Italian, Spanish, Danish, Swedish, Dutch, Flemish, German, Polish, and Magyar. There are two Dutch translations and twelve German ones; and the Italian translation enjoys the honour of the pope's prohibition. It has been dramatised in twenty forms, and acted in every capital in Europe, and in the free States of America.

Uncommercial Traveller, The. A volume of sketches by Dickens, first published serially in "All the Year Round" in 1860.

Uncompagre (un-kom-pä'gre) River. A tributary of the Gunnison River, in Colorado.

Undine (un-dën' or un'dën; G. pron. ün-dë'ne). A tale by Fonqué, Baron de la Motte, published in German in 1811. Undine is a water-spirit who is endowed with a soul by her marriage with a mortal.

Unfortunate Peace, The. A name sometimes given to the treaty of Câteau-Cambrésis (which see).

Ungama Bay. See Formosa Bay.

Ungarisch-Brod. A town in Moravia, Austria-Hungary, situated near the Olšawa 45 miles south-southeast of Olmütz. Population (1890), commune, 4,036.

Ungarn. The German name of Hungary.

Ungava Bay (ung-gä'vä bä). An arm of Hudson Strait, projecting into Labrador.

Unger (öng'er). Franz. Born in Styria, 1800; died at Gratz, Feb. 13, 1870. A distinguished Austrian botanist and paleontologist, professor of botany at Vienna from 1850. He was particularly noted for his researches in the anatomy and physiology of plants and in fossil botany.

Ungern-Sternberg (öng'ern-stern'berg), Baron Alexander von. Born near Reval, Estonia, 1806; died at Dannenwalde, Mecklenburg-Strelitz, Aug. 24, 1868. A German novelist. Among his best-known novels are "Der Missionar," "Diane," and "Die Royalisten."

Unicorn, The. See Monoceros.

Unieh (ü'ni-e or ü'në'e). A small seaport on the coast of the Black Sea, Asiatic Turkey, 120 miles west of Trebizond.

Uniformity Act. In English history: (a) An act of Parliament, passed in 1549, which provided for uniformity of religious service. (b) An act of Parliament passed May 19, 1662. It obliged holders of church livings to be ordained by a bishop; to assent to the Prayer-book; to renounce the Covenant; to declare the unlawfulness of bearing arms against the sovereign; and to make oath of canonical obedience. Many clergymen resigned their benefices.

Unigenitus Dei Filius (ü-ni-jen'it-us dë'i fil'i-us). [L., 'Only-begotten Son of God.'] A bull promulgated by Pope Clement XI. in 1713, in which the Jansenists were condemned.

Union (ü'nyon). The. 1. The United States of America.—2. Same as Union, Act of, 3.

Union, Act of. 1. A statute of 1535-36, which enacted the political union of Wales to England.—2. A statute of 1706, which united the kingdoms of England and Scotland on and after May 1, 1707.—3. A statute of 1800, which united the kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland on and after Jan. 1, 1801.

Unionists (ü'nyon-ists). In British politics, those who are opposed to the dissolution or rupture of the legislative union existing between Great Britain and Ireland, and especially to the separatist principles and tendencies of those who desire to establish home rule in Ireland: a name applied to the Conservatives and Liberal-Unionists.

Union Jack. The national ensign of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, used in a small form as a jack—that is, displayed at the end of the bowsprit. The name "union jack" has come wrongly to be applied to the larger union flag itself. It is formed by the union of the cross of St. George (red on a white field), the diagonal cross or saltire of St. Andrew (white on a blue field), and the diagonal cross or saltire of St. Patrick (red on a white field). The jack is not flown on shore.

Union League Club. A social and political (Republican) club, organized in New York city in 1863, and incorporated in 1865. Its stated objects at the time of its organization during the War of the Rebellion were "to promote, encourage, and sustain, by all proper means, absolute and unqualified loyalty to the government of the United States; to discountenance and rebuke, by moral and social influences, all disloyalty to said government, and every attempt against the integrity of the Nation"; and also to establish a library and art gallery for the collection of literature, works of art, and military trophies relating to the war. House, Fifth Avenue and 30th street. Similar clubs were formed in other cities.

Union Square. A public park in New York city, between Broadway, Fourth Avenue, 14th street, and 17th street.

Uniontown (ü'nyon-toun). The capital of Fayette County, Pennsylvania, 42 miles south by east of Pittsburg. Population (1900), 7,344.

United African Company. A British mercantile company formed in recent years for the purpose of operating on the Niger. It became the National African Company in 1882, and the Royal Niger Company in 1886.

United Brethren. See Moravians.

United Irishmen. An Irish society formed in 1791 by Wolfe Tone, for the purpose of procuring parliamentary reform and the repeal of the penal laws. It afterward became a secret society with revolutionary aims, and was influential in causing the Irish rebellion of 1798.

United Kingdom, The. See Great Britain.

United Netherlands, The. See Netherlands.

United Provinces, The. The seven provinces of the Low Countries—Holland, Zealand, Utrecht, Friesland, Gelderland, Groningen, and Overijssel—which in 1579 formed the Union of Utrecht and laid the foundation of the republic of the Netherlands.

United Provinces of La Plata. See La Plata.

United States (ü-ni'ted stäts), or United States of America. [F. États-Unis, G. Vereinigte Staaten, It. Stati Uniti, Sp. Estados Unidos, D. Vereenigde Staten.] A federal republic which occupies the central part of North America. Capital, Washington. Excluding the detached district of Alaska, it is bounded by British America on the north, the Atlantic on the east, Florida Strait, the Gulf of Mexico, and Mexico on the south, and the Pacific on the west. The great geographical divisions are the Atlantic slope, Appalachian system, Gulf coastal plain, central plain (including the Mississippi valley and the Great Lakes basin), Rocky Mountain system, Columbian plateau, great interior basin, Sierra Nevada and Cascade systems, and Pacific slope. The principal rivers are the Mississippi (with the Missouri, Ohio, etc.), St. Lawrence (forming a part of the boundary with Canada), Yukon, Rio Grande, Colorado, and Columbia; the principal lakes, the group known as "the Great Lakes" (partly in Canada), Great Salt Lake, and Lake Champlain. The most elevated point of land east of the Mississippi River is Mount Mitchell (Black Dome) in North Carolina; west of the Mississippi, apparently Mount Whitney, in the Sierra Nevada of California. There are seemingly no fully active volcanoes within the United States at the present day, but volcanic outbursts have been reported within a comparatively recent period, and many of the western peaks (Shasta, Tacoma, etc.) are volcanic in origin. The leading agricultural products are corn, wheat, oats, sugar, cotton, tobacco, rye, rice, dairy products, live stock, hay, and potatoes. The metallic products are iron, silver, gold, copper, lead, zinc, quicksilver, nickel, aluminum, antimony, platinum; other products are coal, petroleum, natural gas, mineral waters, etc. The principal exports are breadstuffs, cotton, provisions, petroleum, Indian corn, tobacco, sugar, lumber, oil-cake, leather, machinery, cattle, furs. The country is the first in the world in the production of steel, pig-iron, cotton, wheat, and Indian corn, and ranks among the first in tobacco and sugar. There is no universally recognized system of grouping the States of the Union: they are often classified as New England States, Middle States, Southern States (including Lake States and "the Northwest"), and Pacific States. The following is an accepted arrangement—North Atlantic division: Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania. South Atlantic division: Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida (and the District of Columbia). North Central division: Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas. South Central division: Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas (with the Territory of Oklahoma and Indian Territory). Western division: Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, Washington, Oregon, California, Nevada, Idaho, and Utah (with the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico).—In all 45 States and 3 Territories, besides the District of Columbia (which contains Washington, the capital, and is administered by the Federal government), the unorganized Indian Territory, the civil and judicial district of Alaska, and Hawaii. The largest cities are New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, and St. Louis. The Federal executive power is vested in a President, elected for 4 years by an electoral college elected by the votes of the people of the different States. He is assisted by a cabinet of 8 members of his own appointment. The legislative authority is vested in Congress, which consists of a Senate, 2 members of which are returned by each State, and a House of Representatives, at present (1901) of 357 members, returned by the States in the proportion of one for about every 174,000 inhabitants. The separate States have extensive independent powers reserved to them under the Constitution of the republic. The State governments are administered each by a governor and a legislature of two houses. There are distinct Federal and State judicial systems, the highest court in the land being the United States Supreme Court. The inhabitants are mainly of British descent; about 8,600,000 are colored. There are many immigrants and descendants of recent immigrants from Germany, Norway, Sweden, Italy, Bohemia, Russia proper, Poland, Hungary, etc.; also Indians and Chinese. All religions are tolerated, and in a population of such diversified origin all may be said to have adherents. The largest of the Protestant denominations are the Methodists and Baptists. The region is said to have been visited and temporarily colonized by Northmen about 1000. It was seen by the Cabots in 1497-98, and explored by Ponce de Leon in 1513-14, Verrazano in 1524, De Soto in 1539-42, and others. The first permanent settlement was made at St. Augustine in 1565. Thirteen colonies were planted, which by their union in 1776 formed the thirteen original States: Virginia (1607), Massachusetts (1620), New Hampshire (1623), Maryland (1634), Connecticut (1636), Rhode Island (1636), North Carolina, South Carolina, Pennsylvania (1682), and Georgia (1733), all by the English; New York and New Jersey by the Dutch; and Delaware (1683) by Swedes. Among the wars carried on with the Indians were the Pequot war and King Philip's war; with the French and Indians, King William's war, Queen Anne's war, King George's war, and the French and Indian war. The following are among the leading events of United States history: Revolution hastened by the Stamp Act of 1765, taxes in 1767, and the Boston Port Bill of 1774; commencement of the Revolution, 1775 (see Revolutionary War); Declaration of Independence, 1776; Articles of Confederation adopted, 1777-1781; surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown, 1781; recognition of independence, 1783; Ordinance of 1787 relating to the Northwest Territory; Constitution framed, 1787; new form of government inaugurated, 1789, with the capital at New York; capital removed to Philadelphia, 1790; Indian wars, 1790-94; French war, 1798-1800; capital transferred to Washington, 1800; Tripolitan war, 1801-05; Louisiana Purchase, 1803; embargo, 1807; war with Great Britain, 1812-15; cession of Florida by Spain, 1819; Missouri Compromise, 1820; Nullification movement, 1832-33; financial crisis, 1837; annexation of Texas, 1845; Mexican war, 1846-48; acquisition of territory from Mexico, 1848, and by the Gadsden Purchase, 1853; Omnibus Bill, 1850; Kansas-Nebraska Bill, 1854; financial crisis, 1857; secession of eleven States, 1860-61; Civil War, 1861-65 (see Civil War); Lincoln's emancipation proclamations, 1862 and 1863; constitutional prohibition of slavery, 1865; reconstruction in the South, 1865-70; purchase of Alaska from Russia, 1867; financial crisis, 1873; disputed presidential election, 1876-77; resumption of specie payments, 1879; Spanish-American war, 1898, resulting in the acquisition of Porto Rico, Guahan, and the Philippines. Area, 3,025,640 square miles; including Alaska and Hawaii, 3,622,933 square miles. Population (1900), including Alaska, Indian Territory, and Hawaii, 76,293,766.

Upanishads (ö-pa-ni-shadz'). [Skt., from upa, unto, ni, down, and śad, to sit; and so, literally, 'a sitting down by,' 'setting oneself at the feet of another,' 'confidential communication,' 'esoteric doctrine.'] With the Aranyakas, the oldest speculative treatises of the Hindus; they lie at the root of the philosophical side of Hinduisms. Not only are they viewed as shruti, or revelation, equally with the Mantras and Brahmanas, but they are practically the only Veda of all educated Hindus at the present day. Properly each Brahmana had his Aranyakas, or 'forest treatises,' intended for the Ynaprasthas, or 'dwellers in the forest' (that is, Brahmans who, having passed the two earlier stages of the brahmacharya, or student, and the grihastha, or householder, retire into the forest to devote themselves to self-mortification and religious meditation); but the mystical doctrines of the latter were so mingled with extraneous matter that the chapters called Upanishads appear to have been added to investigate more exclusively and definitely such problems as the origin of the universe, the nature of deity, the nature of the soul, and the connection of spirit and matter. Some of the most important are the Atareya Upanishad and the Kaushitaki Brahmana Upanishad of the Rigveda; the Taithiriya belonging to the Taithiriyaashahita of the Yajurveda; the Brihadaranyaka attached to the Shatapathabrahmana of the Vajasaneyashahita of that Veda, and the Isha or Ishavasya, forming the 40th chapter of the latter Shaha; the Chandogya and Kena belonging to the Sama-veda; and the Prashna, Mundaka, Mandukya, and Katha belonging to the Atharvaveda. Following the stratifica-tory principle, in general the only guide in determining the age of Sanskrit works, the ancient Upanishads—that is, those which occupy a place in the Sanhitas, Brahmanas, and Aranyakas—are believed to be older than 600 B. C., or anterior to Buddhism, though the germs of the doctrines contained in them are to be found in some of the latest hymns. The others range through a long period, and are very numerous. The ancient Vedic literature first became known outside of India through these Upanishads. They were translated from Sanskrit into Persian by or for Dara Shukoh, the eldest son of the Mogul emperor Shah Jehan, who held the liberal religious views of Akbar. He had heard of the Upanishads in Kashmir in 1640, invited several pandits to Delhi to assist in their translation, and finished the work in 1657. Translated into Persian, then the most widely read language of the East, they became generally accessible. In 1775 a manuscript of this Persian translation was sent by the French resident at the court of Shajah ud Daula to Anquetil Duperron, the discoverer of the Avesta; and later another manuscript. Anquetil Duperron collated the two, and translated the work into French and into Latin, publishing the latter version in 1801 and 1802 under the title of Opusculum, a corruption of Upanishad. This Latin translation was studied by Schopenhauer. Twelve of them are translated by Max Müller, with introductions and notes, in the "Sacred Books of the East," I. and XV.

Upsala (ö-pä'lä). 1. A laen in eastern Sweden. Area, 2,053 square miles. Population (1893), 122,008.—2. The capital of the laen of Upsala, situated on the river Fyris in lat. 59° 51' N., long. 17° 38' E. It is the seat of a noted university and of an archbishopric. The university was founded by Sten Sture in 1477. It has a library of 250,000 volumes, collections of coins and minerals, botanic garden and museum, observatory, etc. The cathedral was founded in 1260, but has since been altered. Among the radiating choir-chapels is that of Gustavus Vasa, adorned with historical frescoes, and containing the king's tomb with sculptured figures of himself and his first two wives. The dimensions are 359 by 103 feet; length of transepts, 136; height of vaulting, 90. The two west towers have reached only about half of their projected height of 388 feet. The side portals and the exterior of the choir are exceedingly fine. Near Upsala was the medieval city Old Upsala, one of the oldest in the country. Population (1892), 21,190.

Upshur (up'shër), Abel Parker. Born in Northampton County, Va., June 17, 1790; killed on the Potomac, Feb. 28, 1844. An American politician, secretary of the navy 1841-43, and secretary of state 1843-44.

He graduated at West Point in 1861; served in the Army of the Potomac and in Georgia and Alabama during the Civil War, attaining the rank of brigadier-general in 1864; and was commandant of cadets at West Point 1870-75. He wrote "New System of Infantry Tactics" (1867), "Armies of Asia and Europe" (1878), etc.

Ur (ër). The place (in Gen. Ur Kasdim, Ur of the Chaldeans) from which Abraham set out on his journey to Canaan. It has been identified with Uru which figures in the cuneiform inscriptions as the oldest capital of Babylonia and at the same time as an important maritime and commercial city. It is now represented by the ruins of Mughair on the right bank of the Euphrates. It was the principal seat of worship of the moon-god Sin, and is therefore sometimes qualified in the inscriptions as the "moon city."

Urabá (ö-rä-bä'), Gulf of. An old name for the Gulf of Darien; generally restricted to the southern arm which receives the river Atrato.

Ural (ö'ral or ü'ral). A river which rises in the Ural Mountains, flows southwest and south, and empties by a delta into the northern end of the Caspian Sea. It forms for a large part of its course part of the conventional boundary between Europe and Asia. Length, about 1,000 miles; navigable for large vessels from Orenburg.

Ural Mountains. A collection of mountain-ranges situated mainly on the border between Europe and Asia, and in Russian territory. They extend from the Arctic Ocean southward to near lat. 51° N. The chief divisions are the Arctic Urals (in Nova Zembla), Northern Urals (with the Pai-hoi, Vogal, and Obdorsk Mountains), Middle Urals, and Southern Urals. They are famous for their mineral wealth (gold, iron, copper, platinum, and precious stones). Highest peak (Tel-pos), 5,540 feet.

Uralsk (ö-rälsk'). 1. A province of Russia, in Central Asia, lying between Astrakhan and Turgai. Area, 139,168 square miles. Population (1889), 559,552.—2. The capital of Uralsk, situated at the junction of the Tehagan with the Ural, about lat. 51° 10' N. Population, 26,054.

Urania (ü-rä-ni-ä). [NL., from L. Urania, from Gr. Ourania, one of the Muses, lit. 'the Heavenly One.'] 1. In Greek mythology, the Muse of astronomy and celestial forces, and the arbitress of fate, second only to Calliope in the company of the Muses. Her usual attributes are a globe, which she often holds in her hand, and a little staff or compass for indicating the course of the stars.

2. An asteroid (No. 30) discovered by Hind at London, July 22, 1854.

Uranienborg (ö-rä-në-en-borg). A castle on the island of Hven, Sweden, the seat of the observatory of Tycho Brahe.

Uranus (ü'ra-nus). [L., from Gr. Ouranos, a personification of heaven, equivalent to Skt. Varuna, a deity of the highest rank in the Veda, later a god of the waters.] 1. In classical mythology, the son of Gæa or Ge (the Earth), and by her the father of the Titans, Cyclopes, etc. He hated his children, and confined them in Tartarus; but, on the instigation of Gæa, Cronus, the youngest of the Titans, overthrew and dethroned him.

2. In astronomy, the outermost but one of the planets, appearing to the naked eye as a faint star. It was discovered as a moving body with a disk, March 13, 1781, by Sir W. Herschel; but had previously been observed twenty times as a star by different observers. These are called the ancient observations of Uranus. The planet, seen with a telescope of the first class, appears as a small bluish disk with two bands. It is a little smaller than Neptune, its diameter being 31,000 miles; its mass is $\frac{1}{45}$ of that of the sun, or 14.7 times that of the earth; its density therefore is about 1.4, being a little more than that of Jupiter. It is about 19.2 times as far from the sun as the earth is; and its period of revolution is about 84 years and a week. It has four satellites—Ariel, Umbriel, Titania, and Oberon—of which the first two are extremely difficult telescopic objects. They revolve in one plane, nearly perpendicular to that of the planet.

Urban (ör'ban) I. [L. Urbanus, of the city; It. Urbano, F. Urbain.] Bishop of Rome 222-230.

Urban II. (Udo or Eudes). Born at Châtillon-sur-Marne, France; died 1099. Pope 1088-99. He continued the policy of Gregory VII. against lay investiture and in opposition to Henry IV.; excommunicated Philip I. of France; and furthered the first Crusade.

Urban III. (Uberto Crivelli). Pope 1185-87. He opposed the emperor Frederick I.

Urban IV. (Jacques Pantaléon). Pope 1261-1264. He opposed Manfred of Sicily.

Urban V. (Guillaume de Grimoard). Born in southern France; died 1370. Pope 1362-70.

Urban VI. (Bartolomeo Prignano). Pope 1378-89. The papal schism began in his reign; the cardinals elected Clement VII. antipope.

Urban VII. (Giovanni Battista Castagna). Pope in 1590, for 13 days.

Urban VIII. (Maffeo Barberini). Born at Florence, 1568; died 1644. Pope 1623-44. He annexed the duchy of Urbino, and supported the policy of France in the Thirty Years' War.

Urban, Sylvanus. The pseudonym of the editor of the "Gentleman's Magazine."

Urbino (ŭr-bō'nō). [L. Urvinum Metaurense, ML Urbīnum.] A city in the province of Pesaro e Urbino, Italy, situated on a hill in lat. 43° 44' N., long. 12° 38' E.; the capital of the former duchy of Urbino, and a celebrated center of art and literature in the 15th and 16th centuries. It was the birthplace of Raphael. It contains a cathedral and a ducal palace, and is the seat of an archbishop, and formerly of a university. The ducal palace is one of the finest examples of the cinque-cento or early Renaissance style, light in proportions and richly ornamented. The south front has three superimposed loggias, and two machicolated cylindrical flanking towers. The court, with two stories and an attic, the lower story arcaded, is celebrated. The saloons are well proportioned, and decorated with sculptured arabesques, foliage, etc. Population (1881), 5,087; commune, 16,812.

Urbino, Duchy of. A former duchy comprising Urbino, Pesaro, and other places in their vicinity. It was ruled by princes of the Montefeltro family, and later was under the house of Della Rovere. It was annexed by the Papal States in 1631, and by Victor Emmanuel in 1860.

Ure (ŭr), Andrew. Born at Glasgow, 1778; died at London, June 2, 1857. A Scottish chemist, professor of chemistry and natural history at the Andersonian institution in Glasgow. He published a "Dictionary of Chemistry" (1821), "A New System of Geology" (1829), "Philosophy of Manufactures" (1835), "Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines" (1837-39; revised by Hunt), etc.

Ures (ŭr-ēs). A former capital of the state of Sonora, Mexico, situated on the Rio Sonora about lat. 29° 20' N. Population, about 9,000.

Urfé (ŭr-fā'), Honoré D'. Born at Marseilles, 1567; died in 1625. A French writer. He was of a noble family, and seems to have been intended for the church. A marriage unfortunate in all its circumstances drove him into retirement, where he composed his "Astree" (which see), as the author of which he is usually known. He was a voluminous pastoral and amatory writer.

Urganda (ŭr-gān'dā). A fairy and enchantress in the legend of Amadis de Gaul.

Urgel (ŭr-hel'). A town in the province of Lerida, Spain, on the Segre 74 miles north-northwest of Barcelona. It is the seat of a bishop who, conjointly with France, supervises the republic of Andorra.

Uri (ŭri). One of the Forest Cantons of Switzerland, bounded by the Lake of Lucerne, Schwyz, Glarus, Grisons, Ticino, Valais, Bern, and Unterwalden. Capital, Altorf. It is traversed by the Reuss and by the St. Gotthard Railway. The language is chiefly German (but Italian also is spoken); religion, Roman Catholic. Uri sends one representative to the National Council. It united in leagues with other Forest Cantons in the 12th and 14th centuries, conquered the Val Leventina in the 15th century; was assigned to the canton Waldstätten in 1798; was the scene of conflicts between the French and the Russians and Austrians in 1799; became a canton in 1803, without the Val Leventina; and joined the Sonderbund. Area, 415 square miles. Population (1888), 17,249.

Uri, Bay of or Lake of, or Urner See (ŭr'ner zā). The southeastern arm of the Lake of Lucerne, Switzerland. Length, 7 miles. It is bordered by high mountains.

Uriah (ŭri-ā'). [Heb., 'Yahveh is my light.'] A Hittite officer in the army of David, husband of Bathsheba: killed by order of David.

Urian (ŭri-ān; G. pron. ŭr-ān), Sir. A name formerly used to designate an unknown person, or one whose name, even if known, it was not thought proper to mention. In this sense it was sometimes applied to the devil. In the "Parzival" of Wolfram von Eschenbach, the unprincipled Prince of Punturtois is called Urian. Bayard Taylor, Notes to Faust, sc. xxi.

Uriconium (ŭri-kō'ni-um), or Viroconium (vir-ō-kō'ni-um). An ancient town in Britain, on the site of the modern Wroxeter, near Shrewsbury.

Uriel (ŭri-ēl). [Heb., 'light of God.'] One of the seven archangels. He is spoken of in 2 Esdras as the good angel. He has been conceived to be an angel of light, and his station to be in the sun. He is introduced by Milton in "Paradise Lost," and by Longfellow in the "Goethe Legend."

Urner Loch. A tunnel in the St. Gotthard Pass, Switzerland, between the Devil's Bridge and Andermatt.

Urner See (ŭr'ner zā). Same as Uri, Bay of.

Urquhart (ŭrč'härt), David. Born in the county of Cromarty, Scotland, 1805; died 1877. A British publicist and politician. He was a Conservative member of Parliament. He published "Observations on European Turkey" (1831), "Turkey and its Resources" (1833), "Spirit of the East" (1838), "Pillars of Hercules" (1848), "The Lebanon" (1860), and various works against Russia, the United States, on French affairs, etc.

Urquhart, or Urchard (ŭrč'härt), Sir Thomas. Born about 1605; died 1660. A Scottish Royalist and author. He possessed estates in Cromarty; was educated at King's College, Aberdeen; and traveled, having a good knowledge of foreign tongues. He was declared a rebel by Parliament; took arms on the king's side; fought in the battle of Worcester; and, though sent a prisoner to London, had some liberty. He escaped, and died abroad. He published several works, but is best known from his translation of Rabelais (1653).

Urquiza (ŭr-kē'thā), Justo José. Born near Concepcion del Uruguay, Entre Rios, March 19, 1800; assassinated on his estate of San José, near the same place, April 11, 1871. An Argentine general and politician. As a country shopkeeper he acquired great influence over the Gauchos, and in 1844-45, with an army of 4,000 of them, assisted Oribe against the government of Montevideo, defeating Rivera at India Muerta, March 28, 1845. In 1846 he was elected governor of Entre Rios. The loose federative system then in vogue in the Argentine gave practically unlimited powers to the governors or dictators. Urquiza ruled Entre Rios as an independent state and for his own advantage, acquiring a very large fortune. As a leader of the federalist party he made war on the unitarians of Corrientes. In 1851 he joined forces with Brazil and Montevideo; compelled Oribe to capitulate Oct. 8, ending the "nine years' siege" of Montevideo; and on Feb. 3, 1852, defeated and overthrew Rosas at the battle of Monte-Caseros. He was at once proclaimed provisional dictator of the Argentine Confederation, and in May, 1853, was elected president for 6 years. Buenos Ayres refused to join the confederation until forced to do so by Urquiza's victory at Cepeda, Oct. 23, 1859. Urquiza retained the presidency until May, 1860, when he took command of the army. Buenos Ayres revolted soon after, and the federalist army of Urquiza was defeated by Mitre at Pavon, Sept. 17, 1861. With this battle the federalist system came to an end. Urquiza retired to Entre Rios, where he continued to rule in a kind of feudal state, though with somewhat diminished power, until his death. He evaded taking an active part in the Paraguayan war.

Urraca (ŭr-rā'kā). Died 1126. Queen of Castile, daughter of Alfonso VI. of Castile. She married Alfonso of Aragon; was divorced from him in 1111; and carried on civil war in Spain against her husband and son.

Ursa Major (ŭr-sā mā'jor). [L., 'the Greater Bear.'] The most prominent constellation of the northern heavens, representing a bear with an enormous tail. There is a rival figure for the same constellation—a wagon. (See Wain.) Both figures are mentioned by Homer. The name of the bear is translated from some original Aryan language, since the constellation in Sanskrit is called rishabha—a word which means in different genders a 'bear' and a 'star.' As the seven stars of the Great Bear are in many languages called the Septentrions, it is probable the figure of the bear, which by its tail would seem to have originated among some people not familiar with bears, may have been the result of a confusion of sound. Draco appears to have had formerly a longer tail, twisting down in front of Ursa Major. The principal stars of the Great Bear compose the figure of Charles's Wain, or the Dipper.

Ursa Minor (ŭr-sā mī'nor). [L., 'the Smaller Bear.'] A constellation near the north pole, the figure of which imitates that of Ursa Major, which its configuration resembles. It also has a rival figure of a wagon, and is sometimes called the Cynosure, which seems to mean 'dog's tail.' At the time of the formation of these constellations the pole must have been near a Draconis; and during the greater part of history sailors have steered by Ursa Minor as a whole. In the tail of the Little Bear is the pole star.

Ursern (ŭr'zern), or Urseren (ŭr'zer-en). The same as Andermatt.

Ursinus (ŭr-sī'nus), or Urcicinus (ŭr-si-sī'nus). Antipope 366-384.

Ursua (ŭr-sŭ'ā), Pedro de. Born at Ursua, near Pamplona, Navarre, about 1510; died at Machiparo, on the Upper Amazon, Jan. 1, 1561.

A Spanish soldier. He was governor of New Granada 1545-46; led expeditions from Bogotá in search of El Dorado 1547 and 1549-52, founding Pamplona and other places; and subdued the rebellious Cimarrones of Panama 1555-57. In 1559 the Marquis of Cañete, viceroy of Peru, commissioned him to lead an expedition to the region of the upper Amazon in search of El Dorado and the "kingdom" of the Omaguas (which see). The ulterior object of the viceroy was to get rid of the wild adventurers who had been attracted to Peru by the civil wars. Some hundreds of these joined Ursua, who took the title of "Governor of Omagua and El Dorado," and embarked in boats at Lamas on the Moyobamba in Sept., 1560. He descended the Moyobamba and Ifuallaga to the Amazon, where he was killed by Lope de Aguirre and other conspirators. (See Aguirre.) Also written Orsua.

Ursula (ŭr'sŭ-lā), Saint. [ML., 'a she-bear'; It. Orsola, Sp. Ursola, F. Ursule.] In Christian legend, a British saint and martyr who, with 11,000 virgins, was said to have been put to death by an army of Huns near Cologne. In the first part of the 12th century, in digging foundations for new walls, the citizens of Cologne found a large number of bones in the cemetery of the old Roman town Colonia Agrippina. These were announced by Elizabeth of Sionau, a visionary nun, as the relics of the 11,000 virgins, and for many years were so venerated. Bones of men and children, however, were found among them, and this was variously explained by inspired persons. The Church of St. Ursula of Cologne is still visited by thousands of credulous believers in the miraculous properties of the bones of Roman colonists. One matter-of-fact explanation of the 11,000 reduces them to one in the person of a St. "Udecemilla." St. Ursula has been identified by Dr. Oscar Schade with the Swabian goddess Horsel, or Ursel, who is the Holda (or Venus) of Teutonic mythology turned into a saint of the Christian calendar.

Urubamba (ŭrŭ-bām'bā). A name given to the Ucayale in the upper part of its course.

Urugal (ŭrŭ-gāl'). The Babylonian Hades. The word is of Sumerian origin, and means 'the great city.'

Uruguay (ŭrŭ-gwī'; or, as Eng., ŭ'rŭ-gwā). A river which rises in southeastern Brazil (Santa Catharina), near the coast, flows west, southwest, and south, forms the boundary between Rio Grande do Sul in Brazil and Uruguay on the east, and the Argentine Republic on the west, and empties into the estuary of the Rio de la Plata in lat. 34° S. Its chief tributaries are the Ibicuy and Negro. Length, about 1,000 miles. It is navigable to Salto (about 200 miles), and above that, for small vessels, 300 miles farther.

Uruguay, or República Oriental del Uruguay (ŭr-pŭ'blē-kā ŭr-en-tāl' del ŭrŭ-gwī'), often Banda Oriental (bān'dā ŭr-en-tāl'). A republic in South America, bounded by Brazil, the Atlantic, the estuary of the Rio de la Plata, and the river Uruguay (which separates it from the Argentine Republic). Capital, Montevideo. The surface consists generally of grassy lands traversed by low ridges; the chief occupation is the rearing of cattle and sheep; the leading exports, live stock, wool, beef, hides, tallow, etc. It has 19 departments. The government is vested in a president and a parliament consisting of a senate and a chamber of representatives. The prevailing religion is Roman Catholic. Of the inhabitants the majority are native Uruguayans, many of the country people being of the mixed race called Gauchos (which see); but there are also many Italians, Spaniards, French, Brazilians, etc. The prevailing language is Spanish. Uruguay was settled by Spanish Jesuits in the 17th century, and by Portuguese and Spanish colonists later; became a Spanish province, annexed to the viceroyalty of La Plata, in 1776; was joined to Brazil in 1821; revolted against Brazil in 1825; and was recognized as an independent state in 1828. Montevideo was besieged by the combined forces of Oribe and Rosas 1842-51. Area, 72,172 square miles. Population (1893), 748,130.

Uruguayana (ŭrŭ-gwī-ā'nā). A town of the state of Rio Grande do Sul, Brazil, on the river Uruguay near lat. 29° 35' S. It is the principal Brazilian port on the Uruguay, and has an important trade in cattle. The Paraguayan army which invaded Rio Grande do Sul in 1865 was besieged in this place by the combined forces of Brazil, Uruguay, and the Argentine Republic, and surrendered (nearly 6,000 men) Sept. 18. The Emperor of Brazil and Presidents Mitre and Flores took part in the siege. Population, about 6,000.

Urumiah, or Oroomiah (ŭrŭ-mē'ā), or Urmia (ŭr-mē'ā). A city in the province of Azerbaijan, Persia, 70 miles west-southwest of Tabriz: the traditional birthplace of Zoroaster. It is the seat of an American mission. Population, estimated, 25,000.

Urumiah, Lake. A salt lake in Persia, west of Tabriz, intersected by lat. 38° N. It contains many small islands. The water is intensely salt and is shallow. It has no outlet. Elevation above sea-level, over 4,000 feet. Length, about 85 miles.

Urundi (ŭrŭn'dē). A land in Africa, north of Lake Tanganyika.

Urungu (ŭrŭng'gŭ), or Ulungu (ŭlŭng'gŭ). A district in central Africa, south and southeast of Lake Tanganyika.

Urus, or Uros. See Puquinas.

Urvashi (ŭr'va-shē; Vedie ŭr-va'shē). [According to Böhtlingk and Roth, from uru, wide, and then great, and vaçī = vaça, desire.] In the Rigveda, 'longing,' 'desire,' and in X. 95 personified as a woman beloved by Pururavas. The obscure hymn consists of a dialogue between Pururavas and Urvashi. They are interpreted by Max Müller ("Oxford Essays" (1856) and "Chips from a German Workshop") as the Sun and the Dawn. Urvashi is especially important as the heroine of Kalidasa's "Vikramorvasi."

Usbegs (us'begz), or Uzbeqs (uz'begz). A Turkish people, socially and politically rather than ethnically distinct, dwelling in various parts of central Asia, chiefly in the cities. They form the influential class. Number, estimated, 2,000,000. They rose to power in the 13th century.

Usboi (ŭs-boi'). A depression in central Asia, east of the Caspian Sea and west of the Amudaria: formerly supposed to be the ancient course of the latter.

Usedom (ŭze-dom). An island, belonging to Pomerania, Prussia, which, with the island of Wollin, separates the Pomeranian Haff from the Baltic. Chief town, Swinemünde. Length, about 30 miles.

Usedom, Count Karl Georg Ludwig Guido von. Born on the island of Rügen, July 17, 1805; died at San Remo, Jan. 22, 1884. A Prussian diplomatist, distinguished as ambassador to Italy 1863-69.

Ushak (ô-shâk'). A town in the western part of Asia Minor, about 120 miles east of Smyrna. Population, 15,000.

Ushant (ush'ant), F. Ouessant (wes-soñ'). An island off the coast of France, belonging to the department of Finistère, in lat. 48° 25' N., long. 5° 3' W. It contains the village St.-Michel. Length, 4½ miles. Population (1891), 2,490.

Ushant, Battle of. A naval battle fought near Ushant, in 1778, between the French under d'Orvilliers and the British under Keppel. The advantage was with the former.

Ushas (ô'shas; Vedic ô-shas'). [From √ vas, light up, dawn; cognate with Gr. ἠώς, L. Aurora for Ausosa, and E. east. With the kindred Skt. usrá', dawn, is also to be compared the Old Germanic Aus-t-rô, a goddess of the year-dawn or spring-light, and AS. Eos-t-ra, the name of whose festival, Easter, occurring in April, was transferred to the Christian festival which replaced it.] The Vedic Dawn, a favorite object of celebration with the poets of the Rigveda. She is the daughter of the Sky (Dyaus), sister of Bhaga, and kinswoman of Varuna, and also sister of Night, and in one passage the elder sister. The Sun is her lover, and follows her track. She brings the eye of the gods. Agni is also her lover, fire being kindled for sacrifice at dawn. She is the friend of the Ashvins, whom she awakens with her song. She is borne onward in a shining chariot from the distant east, and in one passage arrives in a hundred chariots. She is drawn by ruddy horses, or by cows or bulls of the same hue. She is compared to a beautiful maiden dressed by her mother, to a richly decked dancing-girl, a daily attired wife appearing before her husband, or a female rising resplendent from her bath. She is the life and breath of all things, causing the birds to fly from their nests, and, like an active wife arousing her household, awakening the five races of men. She is young, being born anew every day, and yet old — nay, immortal. See Mittr's "Original Sanskrit Texts," V. 181-198, for translations of Ushas hymns and details.

Usher, or Ussher (ush'er), James, Latinized Usserius (us-sé'ri-us). Born at Dublin, Jan. 4, 1580; died at Reigate, Surrey, England, March 20, 1656. A British prelate, theologian, and scholar. He took the degree of M. A. at Trinity College, Dublin, in 1600; was regius professor of divinity there 1607-1620; and chancellor of St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin, in 1603; was appointed bishop of Meath in 1620; and became archbishop of Armagh and primate of Ireland in 1624 or 1625. He was on a visit to England at the outbreak of the civil war, and took sides with Charles I., with the result that he lost nearly all his property in Ireland, with the exception of his library. He was preacher to the Society of Lincoln's Inn, London, from 1647 until shortly before his death. His most notable work is "Annales Veteris et Novi Testamenti" (1650-54), in which he proposed a scheme of biblical chronology that was universally accepted until disproved by recent investigations.

Uspites (û-sip'i-téz), or Usipii (û-sip'i-i), or Usipes (û-si'péz). [L. (Cæsar) Uspites, (Tacitus) Usipii, Gr. (Strabo) Οὐσιπιοί.] A German tribe first mentioned by Cæsar, who describes them as having been driven by the Suevi (59 B. C.), together with the Tencteri, from their original homes. With the Tencteri they were defeated by Cæsar on the left bank of the Rhine, near the confluence of the Maas, whence they withdrew to the opposite side, to the north of the Sugambri. Ptolemy, who names them for the last time, places them further to the south, in the Main region. They were probably merged ultimately in the Alamanni.

Usk (usk). [Celtic, 'water.'] A river in South Wales and Monmouthshire, England, which joins the estuary of the Severn 18 miles west-northwest of Bristol. Length, about 60 miles.

Uskoken (ôs'kô-ken). [Serb, 'fugitives.'] Fugitives from Servia and Bosnia who went to Venetian and Hungarian lands about the beginning of the 16th century to escape Turkish tyranny.

Uskup (ôs'kup), or Uskub (ôs'kub), or Uskiub (ôs'kô-ub), or Skoplie. The capital of the vilayet of Kosovo, European Turkey, situated on the Vardar in lat. 42° 1' N., long. 21° 32' E.; the ancient Senpi or Scopi. It is a strategic point. It has manufactures of leather, etc. Population, about 25,000.

Uspallata (ôs-pâl-yä'tä) Pass. [Sp. Boquete or Portillo de Uspallata.] A pass over the Andes, between the Argentine Republic and Chile, near lat. 32° 49' S. The highest point is about 12,500 feet above the sea. During the colonial period this pass was the principal means of communication between Santiago and the Chilean cities east of the Andes. It was the route taken by San Martín in his famous invasion of Chile, Jan., 1817. The Transandine Railroad passes through it. Also Cumbre (Cambre) Pass.

Ussher, James. See Usher.

Ustica (ôs'tê-kü). A mountainous island in the Mediterranean, belonging to Italy, 43 miles north by west of Palermo. It contains a penal establishment. Length, 4 miles. Population (1881), 1,793.

Ust-Kamenogorsk (öst'kä-men-ô-gorsk'). A town in the province of Semipalatinsk, Russian Asia, situated on the Irtysh 150 miles southeast of Semipalatinsk. Population (1888), 6,819.

Ust-Urt (öst'ört'). A plateau in central Asia, between the Sea of Aral and the Caspian Sea. It is mainly a desert.

Usuramo (ô-sô-rä'mô). A region in East Africa, situated southwest of Zanzibar, near the coast. Since 1885 it has been a possession of the German East Africa Company. Also Uzaramo.

Uta (û'tä), or Utah, or Ute (û'tê), or Yonta. [Pl., also Utah or Utahs.] A division of the Shoshonean stock of North American Indians, embracing 15 tribes, which formerly occupied the entire central and western portions of Colorado and the northeastern portion of Utah, including the eastern part of Salt Lake valley and Utah valley. On the south they extended into New Mexico, occupying much of the country drained by the Rio San Juan. In the northeastern part of their range they intermarried extensively with other Shoshonean branches, as the Shoshoni, Bannock, Paiute, and with the Jicarilla Apache. The Uta are now confined to reservations, and they number in Southern Ute agency, Colorado, 985; in Ouray reserve, Utah, 1,021; and in Uintah reserve, Utah, 833. Total, 2,839. See Shoshonean.

Utah (û'tä or û'tä). [From the Indian tribal name.] One of the United States (the 45th). Capital, Salt Lake City. It is bounded by Idaho and Wyoming on the north, Colorado on the east, Arizona on the south, and Nevada on the west. The surface is mountainous and plateau, including the Wahsatch and Uintah Mountains and part of the Great Basin. The Great Salt Lake is in the north. The silver- and lead-mines are important. Utah contains 27 counties, and sends 2 senators and 1 representative to Congress. The inhabitants are largely Mormons. This region formed part of the lands ceded by Mexico in 1848. The Mormons settled here in 1847-48. Utah was organized as a Territory in 1850. The Mountain Meadow massacre of Gentile settlers by Indians and Mormons occurred in 1857. Disturbances in 1856 led to the sending of an expedition of United States troops to Utah in 1857; the Mormons submitted in 1858. The Edmunds Act of 1882, followed by supplementary legislation, punished and discouraged polygamy in the Mormon Church. A large Gentile immigration has taken place in recent years. On July 17, 1894, the President signed a bill for the admission of Utah to the Union as a State ("enabling act") and it was admitted in 1896. Area, 84,970 square miles. Population (1900), 276,749.

Utah Lake. A fresh-water lake in Utah, 28 miles south of Salt Lake City. Its outlet is by the Jordan into Great Salt Lake. Height above sea-level, about 4,400 feet. Length, 23 miles.

Utatlan (ô-tät-läu'), or Gumarcaah (gô-mär-kä-ä'). The ancient capital of the Quiché Indians of Guatemala, near the site of the modern city of Santa Cruz del Quiché. It is said to have lived with Mexico in splendor, and was fortified with great skill. Twenty generations of chiefs or "kings" reigned in it. (See Quichés.) It was destroyed by Alvarado in 1524.

Ute. See Uta.

Utgard-Loki (üt'gård-lô'kô). In Norse mythology, the chief of the giants.

Uther (û'thër). In the Arthurian cycle of romance, a king of Britain and father of Arthur, known from his rank as Uther Pendragon.

Utica (û'ti-kä'). [L. Utica, Gr. Οὐτική, Οὐτική, Ἰρική.] In ancient geography, a city in Africa, situated near the Bagradas 25 miles north-northwest of Carthage. It was founded by the Phenicians; sided in the third Punic war with Rome; and succeeded Carthage as the leading city of Africa. It was held by Cato for the Pompeians in 40 B. C.

Utica. The capital of Oneida County, New York, situated on the Mohawk River 83 miles west-northwest of Albany. It is a railroad center, and is on the Erie Canal. It is the leading market in the United States for cheese, and has manufactures of clothing, boots and shoes, etc. Fort Schuyler was built in 1758, and the town was settled after the Revolution. It was incorporated as a city in 1832. Population (1900), 56,383.

Uticensis (û-ti-sen'sis). [L., 'of Utica.'] A surname of Cato the Younger.

Ütlberg (üt'lô-berg). A peak of Mount Albis, Switzerland, 4 miles west of Zurich; noted for its view. Height, 2,864 feet.

Utopia (u-tô'pi-ä'). [NL., 'no where,' from Gr. οὐ, no, not, and τοπος, place, spot.] A political romance by Sir Thomas More, published in Latin in 1516; so called from an imaginary island, the seat of an ideal commonwealth. The original title was "De Optimo Reipublice Statu, deque Nova Insula Utopia." It was translated in 1551 by Ralph Robinson, and by Bishop Burnet in 1683. The name "Utopia" has given rise to the adjective utopian with the meaning of 'impracticable' or 'ideal,' especially as applied to schemes for the advancement of social conditions.

Utrecht (û'treht; D. pron. ü'treht). 1. A province of the Netherlands, bounded by North Holland, Zuyder Zee, Gelderland, and South Holland. Area, 534 square miles. Population (1892), 229,054.—2. The capital of the province of Utrecht, situated on the Kromme Rijn, at its division into the Vecht and the Oude Rijn, in lat. 52° 5' N., long. 5° 7' E.: the Roman Trajectus (ferry). It is a railway center, and has manufactures of cigars, chemicals, etc. The noted Cathedral of St. Martin consists of a spacious choir and transepts of the 13th century. The nave fell in 1674, and was not rebuilt: thus the fine west tower, 338 feet high, stands at a distance from the existing church. The vaulting is 115 feet high, and the proportions and details are excellent. Utrecht is also the seat of a university. Its medieval bishops possessed great power. It was often a residence of the German emperors, and was an early seat of the States-General. Population (1900), 104,194.

Utrecht, Peace of. The peace concluded in 1713, through several separate treaties, between France on one side and Great Britain, Holland, Prussia, Savoy, and Portugal on the other, and acceded to by Spain. With the subsequent treaties of Rastatt and Baden, it put an end to the War of the Spanish Succession. Philip V. (of Bourbon) was confirmed as king of Spain, the crowns of France and Spain never to be united; and France recognized the Protestant succession in England. Prussia was recognized as a kingdom. Great Britain received Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, etc., in North America, and Gibraltar and Minorca, with the right to send African slaves to America. Holland was secured by the Barrier Treaty. The Spanish Netherlands, sardinia, the Milanese, and Naples were ceded to Austria. Savoy received Sicily from Spain. Prussia received Neuchâtel and part of Gelderland, and renounced its claims to Orange. Portugal received additions in South America.

Utrecht, Union of. The union, concluded in 1579, of the seven united provinces, Holland, Zealand, Utrecht, Gelderland, Overijssel, Groningen, and Friesland, which became the Dutch republic.

Uttoxeter (uks'e-tër or u-tok'se-tër). A town in Staffordshire, England, situated near the Dove 28 miles north of Birmingham. Population (1891), 4,981.

Uvaroff (ô-vä'rof), Count Sergei. Born at Moscow, Aug. 25, 1785; died there, Sept. 16, 1856. A Russian statesman and scholar. He was president of the St. Petersburg Academy of Sciences from 1818, and minister of public instruction 1832-48. He did much to promote higher instruction in Russia. He wrote "Etudes de philologie et de critique" (1843), "Esquisses politiques et littéraires" (1848), etc.

Uvira (ô-vë'rä). See Vira.

Uxbridge (uks'brjij). A town in Middlesex, England, situated on the Colne 18 miles west by north of London. It was the scene of unsuccessful negotiations between Parliamentary and Royalist commissioners at the beginning of 1645. Population (1891), 8,206.

Uxmal (öz-mäl'). A ruined city of Yucatan, Mexico, about 70 miles south of Merida. The remains are scattered over several square miles, but only a few of the buildings have the walls still standing. These are generally raised on terraced foundations (truncated pyramids), and are of cyclopean masonry faced with dressed stone, in many cases elaborately sculptured. Some of them are very large. The one called "Casa del Gobernador" is 320 feet long, but narrow. The so-called "Casa de las Monjas" is built around a courtyard which measures 258 by 214 feet. There are no idols as at Copan, and nothing resembling the stucco-work of Palenque. One of the most curious features is the great number of protuberant ornaments called "elephants' trunks" by Waldeck. The origin of Uxmal is unknown, but there can be little doubt that it was built by a Maya people. Stephens believed that some of the temples were used by the Indians as late as 1673.

Uz (uz). In biblical geography, a land east of Palestine: the home of Job. It is sometimes placed in Hauran.

Uzbeqs. See Usbeqs.

Uzès (ü-züs'). A town in the department of Gard, France, situated on the Auzon 12 miles north by east of Nîmes. It contains a castle and the campanile of the ancient cathedral. Population (1891), commune, 4,989.

Uzziah (u-zî'ii). A name of Azariah, king of Judah, son of Amaziah. He reigned 792-740 B. C. (Duncker.)

Amaziah was succeeded by Uzziah, whose long and prosperous reign appears to have corresponded pretty exactly with that of Jeroboam II. The current chronology, which obscures this correspondence, is certainly corrupt; and we shall not be far wrong if we view Uzziah and Jotham as the contemporaries of Jeroboam II. and Menahem, while Ahaz of Judah came to the throne soon after Menahem's death, and saw the greater part of the wars which began with the invasion of Tiglath-Pileser and closed with the fall of Samaria. B. K. Smith, Prophecy of Israel, p. 194.

Vaal (vål). The chief head stream and tributary of the Orange River, South Africa. It forms the chief part of the boundary between the Transvaal Colony and the Orange River Colony, and joins the Orange River about lat. 29° 10' S., long. 24° 15' E. Length, 500-600 miles.

Vaca, Cabeza de. See Cabeza de Vaca.

Vaca de Castro (vä'kä dä käs'trō), Cristóval. Born in 1492; died in 1562. A Spanish lawyer and administrator. He was a member of the audience of Valladolid, and in 1540 was sent to Peru to inquire into certain alleged abuses, with orders to act as governor in case of Pizarro's death. He landed on the coast of New Granada (spring of 1541), and crossed to Popayan, where he heard of the assassination of Pizarro and the rebellion of the younger Almagro. Aided by loyal Spaniards, he advanced into Peru. Almagro was defeated at Chupaa (Sept. 16, 1542), and executed, and Castro held the government until the arrival of Viceroy Vela, May 15, 1544. The latter imprisoned him on suspicion of conspiring with the rebels against the new laws, but he escaped and reached Spain in 1545. There he was arrested on charges of peculation, etc., but was exonerated in 1556, after 11 years' imprisonment.

Vach (väch). [Skt., cognate with Latin vox = voc-s, and with Greek ὄψ for ὄψ, originally ὄψ-ς, voice.] In the Rigveda, a feminine personification of speech; the Word; Logos. In the later literature she is identified with Sarasvati.

Vacherot (väsh-rō'), Étienne. Born at Langres, France, July 29, 1809; died at Paris, July 30, 1897. A French philosophical writer, professor of philosophy at the Sorbonne 1839-52. He was attacked by the clerical party on account of his philosophical doctrines; was deprived of his office in 1852 for political reasons; and in 1859 was condemned to three months' imprisonment for his book "La démocratie." In 1871 he was elected to the National Assembly from the department of Seine. His other works include "Histoire critique de l'école d'Alexandrie" (1846), "La métaphysique et la science" (1858), "La religion" (1868), "La science et la conscience" (1870), etc.

Vacquerie (väk-rē'), Auguste. Born Nov. 19, 1819; died Feb. 19, 1895. A French journalist and dramatist, founder in 1869, with Paul Maurice and others, of the radical "Le Rappel." Valdivia (vä'l-dē-vē-ä). 1. A province in Chile, intersected by lat. 40° S. Area, 8,315 square miles. Population (1892), 62,020.—2. A town, capital of the province of Valdivia, Chile, on the Calle-calle River near the sea: its port, called the Corral, is at the mouth of the river. It was founded as a fort by Pedro de Valdivia in Feb., 1552; was a point of great importance during the wars with the Aracanians; and was destroyed by them in the great uprising of 1599. Rebuilt in 1644, it was strongly fortified; pronounced for independence in 1810, but fell into the hands of the Spaniards; and was finally taken by the patriots under Cochrane, after a three days' fight from fort to fort, Feb. 2-4, 1820. Population (1835), 5,680.

Valdivia, Luis de. Born in Granada, 1561; died at Valladolid, Nov. 5, 1642. A Spanish Jesuit missionary in Chile from about 1590 to 1621. He published several works on the Aracanian and other Indian languages, and histories of the Indian wars.

Valdivia, Pedro de. Born near La Serena, Estremadura, 1498 or 1500; died near the fort of Tucapel, southern Chile, Jan. 1 (?), 1554. A Spanish soldier, conqueror of Chile. He served in the Italian wars; went to Venezuela about 1534; and in 1535 passed to Peru, where he served with Pizarro's forces at the battle of Las Salinas, April 26, 1538. After Almagro's death, Pedro Sanchez de Hoz, an incompetent man, was sent from Spain to complete the conquest of Chile; Pizarro associated Valdivia with him, and Hoz soon became a cipher in the expedition. Leaving Cuzco in March, 1540, with 150 Spanish soldiers and a large body of Indians, Valdivia marched by the coast deserts, defeated a large body of natives in the valley of Chile, and on Feb. 12, 1541, founded Santiago. The Indians soon rose against him, and he was closely besieged until the arrival of reinforcements from Peru in Dec., 1543. Valparaiso was founded in Sept., 1544, and in 1546 Valdivia pushed into the Aracanian country to the river Biobio. In 1547-49 he was in Peru, serving with Gasca to suppress the rebellion of Gonzalo Pizarro; during his absence the country was ruled by Valdivia. In 1550-51 the Spaniards continued their conquest of the Aracanian country, passing the Biobio and founding Concepcion, Imperial, Valdivia, etc. Late in 1553 there was a great uprising of the Indians. Valdivia, with fifty horsemen, started from Concepcion to relieve Tucapel, which was closely besieged; was attacked and defeated by the Indians; and was captured and put to death shortly after. Authorities do not agree as to the precise date of the battle and of Valdivia's death.

Valdo. See Waldo.

Varro, Marcus Terentius. Born at Reate, Italy, 116 B. C.; died about 27 B. C. A famous Roman scholar and author: the most learned of the Romans. He held various offices, and rose to the pretorship; joined the party of Pompey; was made by Cæsar director of the public library; and was proscribed by the second Triumvirate, but was saved by his friends. The total number of his works is about 74, comprising 620 books. Of these only two, "De lingua latina" and "De re rustica," survive (the former only in part).

Varro's prose writings embraced almost all branches of knowledge and literature, oratory, history both general and literary, jurisprudence, grammar, philosophy, geography, husbandry, etc. But in all this universal study, Varro always kept his own country and its past steadily in view, and through that portion of his writings exercised an immense influence, both directly and indirectly. The Christian Fathers studied, and among them pre-eminently S. Augustine, especially and used him diligently. The most important prose works of Varro were his "Antiquitates rerum humanarum et divinarum," which long survived in literature, the books "De lingua latina," "Rerum rusticarum," the Encyclopedia of the artes liberales ("Disciplinarius libri"), and his "Imagines," Teuffel and Schwebe, Hist. Rom. Lit. (tr. by Warr), I. 256.

Varuna (vä'rō-nä). [From vr or var, cover, encompass; cognate with Greek οὐρανός, E. Heaven and heaven.] "The Encompasser" of the universe: in the Rigveda, the name of an Aditya, the supreme god among those of the Veda, and therefore called king. To him belong especially the waters, the night, and the West. He is the judge who punishes sin and who is appealed to for forgiveness. From him come avenging diseases, especially dropsy. He is often associated with Mitra, he being the ruler of the night, as Mitra of the day. He is the noblest character of the Vedic pantheon, the few Varuna hymns having a loftier ethical character than is found in any others. Roth identifies the Adityas with the Amshaspadis of the Avesta, and Varuna with Ahura Mazda or Ormazd, regarding Varuna as belonging to an older dynasty of gods common to the Indo-Aryans, of whom he believes the Rigveda to show the suppression of Varuna by Indra. (On this question, see Muir's "Original Sanskrit Texts," V. 116-125.) In the later literature Varuna becomes a mere god of the waters.

Varus (vä'rūs). The ancient name of the Var.

Varus, Publius Quintilius. Died 9 A. D. A Roman general. He was consul 13 B. C.; governor in Syria 6-4 B. C.; and commander in Germany 6-9 A. D. His rigorous measures led to a German alliance against him, and he was totally defeated by Arminius in the famous battle in the Teutoburgerwald 9 A. D. When he saw that the battle was lost, he fell upon his sword. This defeat profoundly affected the Romans, and the loss of his legions was bitterly lamented by Augustus.

A canton of Switzerland, bounded by France on the west and northwest, Neuchâtel, the Lake of Neuchâtel, and Fribourg on the north, Fribourg and Bern on the east, Valais, the Lake of Geneva, and Geneva on the south. Capital, Lausanne. It is traversed by the Jura and by the Alps in the southeast. It has 12 members in the National Council. The prevailing language is French, and the prevailing religion Protestant. Vaud came under Roman rule in 58 B. C. through the victory of Cæsar at Bibracte (chief Roman place, Aventicum); and passed to the Burgundians in the 5th century, and to the Franks, with the kingdom of Burgundy, in 534. The larger part of it was acquired by Savoy in 1265, and was conquered by Bern 1475-76, 1536, and 1565, and ruled as a subject land. An unsuccessful attempt to revolt was made in 1723. By French intervention it was constituted the Lemanic Republic in 1798, and in the same year made the canton Leman of the Helvetic Republic. On the restoration of the confederation in 1803, it became a canton. Area, 1,244 square miles. Population (1888), 247,655.

Vecht (vecht). An arm of the Rhine which leaves it at Utrecht and flows into the Zuyder Zee east of Amsterdam.

Vectis (vek'tis), or Vecta (vek'tij). The Roman name of the Isle of Wight.

Veda (vā'dij). [Skt., from √ vid, know.] 'Knowledge,' 'science,' and then the whole Hindu sacred literature as the science. This includes the Sanhitas, 'collections' of mantras, 'hymns'; the Brahmanas, canonized 'priestly dicta,' with their developments, the Aranyakas and the Upanishads; and the Sūtras, 'rules,' brief memorial lines to aid the teacher in the oral tradition of the sacred literature — the Sanhitas and Brahmanas together forming Śruti, 'hearing,' 'revelation,' while the Sūtras constitute Smṛiti, 'memory,' 'tradition.' There are four Sanhitas, the Vedas, in distinction from the Vedas as including the whole body of sacred literature, or as applied to the Rīgveda par excellence — viz, the Rīgveda, the Sama veda, the Yajurveda, and the Atharvaveda. Of these the Rīgveda and the Atharvaveda are historical collections — that is, collections formed with a view to the perpetuation of the contents as literature; while the Samaveda and the Yajurveda are liturgical — material already existing in the Rīgveda and elsewhere being in them put to special liturgical uses. The first in antiquity, extent, and importance is the Rīgveda, containing 1,017 sukta, 'hymns,' in 10,580 reas, 'verses.' (The stem re, in which ci pronounced as ch in church, when it stands alone becomes rk, but when it comes before a sibilant letter, rg; so Rigveda, usually printed Rigveda, means 'the Veda of reas' (pronounced r'chas, 'verses,' 'songs.'). The hymns, in a very simple metrical form, and a language varying considerably from the later classical Sanskrit, are almost all religious, and glorifications of the divinity addressed. The Atharvaveda (which see) is the latest of the four collections. The Samaveda is the Veda of samans, 'chants.' Material almost all of which is found in the Rīgveda here appears in the form of chants to be sung in the Soṇa ritual. Certain words to be uttered at a special stage of a sacrifice were known technically as a yajus, 'sacrificial formula.' The Yajurveda (with the so of yajus changed into ro owing to the effect of the following letter) is the Yajurveda, or 'Veda of sacrificial formulas.' The question of the date of the Rīgveda, as the oldest of the collections of hymns, has been much discussed, but without definite results. The majority of Vedic scholars place the Vedic period proper between 2000 and 1500 B. C.

Vedanta (vā-dān'ta). [Veda and anta, end.] The most common designation of the Uttaramimamsa school of Hindu philosophy, given to it either as teaching the ultimate aim of the Veda, or as founded on the Upanishads, which come at the end of the Veda as the last stage in its historic evolution. It is ascribed to a Vyasa or Badarayana. The first of these names ('arranger') is given also to the legendary person who is supposed to have arranged the Vedas and written the Mahābhārata, Puranas, and a Dharmashastra, and was doubtless applied to various great writers or compilers as a kind of title. In this sense it seems to have been given to the founder of the Vedanta. Its principles are propounded in sūtras, but Rādayana's sūtras are generally called Brahmasūtra, or sometimes Śharirakausa. The text and that of the celebrated commentary of Śhaṅkarācārya have been edited in the "Bibliotheca Indica," and a portion translated by Banerjia. Ballantyne also edited and translated a portion, as also the commentary known as the Vedāntasāra. The most authoritative recent works on the Vedānta are, however, Paul Deussen's "Die Sūtra des Vedānta ubersetzt aus dem Sanskrit" and his "Das System des Vedānta" (Leipzig, 1883).

Vedantāsāra (vā-dān-ta-sā'ra). [Skt., 'essence of the Vedānta.'] A treatise on the Vedānta philosophy by Śaṅkarācārya. The text is printed in Böhtlingk's "Sanskrit Chrestomathie." It has been translated with full notes in Trübner's "Oriental Series" by Jacob. The name is also given to a commentary by Ramanuja on the Vedāntasūtras, which is also called Vedāntapradīpa, 'The Light or Lamp of the Vedānta.'

Vedas. See Veda.

Vega. The vessel in which Nordenskjöld made his expedition of 1878-79.

Vega (vā'gii), Garcilasso de la. Born at Cuzco, Peru, April 12, 1539; died at Cordova, Spain, 1616. A Peruvian historian. His father was a distinguished Spanish officer of the same name, and his mother was a niece of the Inca Huána Capac (whence he called himself Garcilasso Inca de la Vega). He went to Spain in 1560; served for many years as a captain in the Spanish army; and finally settled in Cordova, where he devoted himself to literary pursuits. He published "El Florida del Inca," a description of De Soto's expedition to Florida (1605), "Comentarios reales de las Incas" (1608), and "Historia general del Peru" (1616). There are many later editions and translations.

Vega Carpio (vā'gii kār'pō-ō), Lope Felix de. Born at Madrid, Nov. 25, 1562; died there, Aug. 27, 1635. A celebrated Spanish dramatist and poet. He was educated at the Jesuit college of Madrid and at the University of Alcalá; was in the service of the Bishop of Avila, and secretary to the Duke of Alva; and was twice married. He was obliged to live in exile from Madrid for several years on account of a duel. He joined the Spanish Armada in 1588, and returned to Madrid in 1590, and was soon known as a dramatic writer; he had previously, during his exile, written for the theater in Valencia. He was the inventor of a witty character known as the "gracioso," a parody of the heroic character of the play, which passed first to the French and from that to all other modern theaters. He entered the church about 1632, after the death of his second wife, and about 1611 took priest's orders. His plays fall into three classes: the first, called "Comedias de capa y espada" (dramas with cloak and sword), "took their name from the circumstance that their principal personages belong to the genteel portion of society, accustomed, in Lope's time, to the picturesque national dress of cloaks and swords—excluding, on the one hand, those dramas in which royal personages appear, and, on the other, those which are devoted to common life and the humbler classes. Their main and moving principle is gallantry—such gallantry as existed in the time of their author. The story is almost always involved and intriguing, and almost always accompanied with an underplot and parody on the characters and adventures of the principal parties, formed out of those of the servants and other inferior personages" (Ticknor). The second class consisted of "Comedias Heroicas" or "Historiales," and the third of dramas founded on domestic life. He also wrote epics ("La Jerusalem conquistada"), romances, lyrics, pastorals, prose novels, etc.

Their [Lope's plays] very number, however, may have been one obstacle to their publication; for the most moderate and certain accounts on this point have almost a fabulous air about them, so extravagant do they seem. In 1603, he gives us the titles of two hundred and nineteen pieces that he had already written; in 1609, he says their number had risen to four hundred and eighty-three; in 1618 he says it was eight hundred; in 1619, again, in round numbers, he states it at nine hundred; and in 1624, at one thousand and seventy. After his death, in 1635, Perez de Montalvan, his intimate friend and eulogist, who three years before had declared the number to be fifteen hundred, without reckoning the shorter pieces, puts it at eighteen hundred plays and four hundred autos: numbers which are confidently repeated by Antonio in his notice of Lope, and by Franchi, an Italian, who had been much with Lope at Madrid, and who wrote one of the multitudinous eulogies on him after his death. The prodigious facility implied by this is further confirmed by the fact, stated by himself in one of his plays, that it was written and acted in five days, and by the anecdotes of Montalvan that he wrote five full-length dramas at Toledo in fifteen days, and one act of another in a few hours of the early morning, without seeming to make any effort in either case.

Ticknor, Span. Lit., II. 203.

Vega Real (vā-rā'el'), Battle of the. A battle fought on the Vega Real (a plain in the northern part of Haiti), April 25, 1495, between a small force of Spaniards under Christopher and Bartholomew Columbus and the Indians of Caonabo and other chiefs. Las Casas says that the latter numbered 100,000—an evident exaggeration. The Indians were completely defeated.

Veglia (vā'l'ya), Slav. Kérk. 1. An island belonging to Istria, Austria-Hungary, situated in the Gulf of Quarnero in lat. 45° N. It is separated from the mainland by the channel of Morlaccia. Length, 24 miles. Population, 19,871. —2. A small seaport on the island of Veglia. It has a cathedral.

Vehmgerichte (fām'ge-riēh'te). [G., from *feh*m, a criminal tribunal so named, and gericht, judgment.] Medieval tribunals which flourished in Germany, chiefly in Westphalia, in the 14th and 15th centuries. They were apparently descended from the cantonal courts, and at first afforded some protection, as the regular machinery of justice had become demoralized. Later they misused their power, and practically disappeared with the increasing strength of the regular governments. The president of the court was called freigraf, the justices freischöffen, and the place of meeting freistuhl. The sessions were open for the adjudication of civil matters, but secret when persons accused of murder, robbery, heresy, witchcraft, etc., were summoned. Those convicted of serious crimes, or those who refused to appear before the tribunal, were put to death. Also freigerichte, Westphalian gerichte, etc.

Vehe (vā'ze), Karl Eduard. Born at Freiberg, Saxony, Dec. 18, 1802; died at Striesen, near Dresden, June 18, 1870. A German historian. He came to America with the separatist Stephan in 1838, but returned in 1839; went to Berlin in 1853, but was arrested for political reasons, imprisoned for six months, and banished from Prussia; and lived thereafter near Basel and in Italy and at Freiberg. His chief work is "Geschichte der deutschen Höfe seit der Reformation," ("History of the German Courts since the Reformation," 1851-55).

Veí, or Vai (vī). A negro tribe of Liberia, West Africa, north of Monrovia. It belongs to the Mande cluster, and has made its way from the elevated interior to the coast. About 1834 a Veí-man, Doah Bukere, who had learned the Roman character, invented and introduced a new graphic system, of the syllabic type, with upward of two hundred signs, which has been used by the Mohammedans for their manuscript books.

Veii (vā'vī). In ancient geography, a city of Italy, the most important of the Etruscan League: identified with Isola Farnese, 11 miles north by west of Rome. It was frequently at war with Rome, especially in behalf of the restoration of Tarquinus Superbus, at the time of the massacre of the Fabii (about 476 B. C.), about 438-434, and about 426. It was besieged by the Romans and taken under the leadership of Camillus in 396 B. C.

Veile (vī'le). 1. An amt in Jutland, Denmark. Population, 111,904. —2. The capital of the amt of Veile, Denmark, situated on the Veile Fjord in lat. 55° 44' N. It was taken by the Schleswig-Holsteiners May 5, 1848. Near it, at Gudsø, May 7, 1849, the Prussians defeated the Danes. Veile was stormed by the Austrians March 8, 1864. Population, 9,015.

Veiled Prophet of Khorassan, The. The first part of the poem "Lalla Rookh," by Moore: so called from the chief character, Mokanna. See Mokanna.

Veile Fjord (vī'le fyórd). An arm of the Great Belt which penetrates the eastern coast of Jutland, Denmark.

Veintemilla (vā-ēn-tā-mēl'yā), Ignacio. Born in Cuenca, 1830. An Ecuadorian general and politician. He led the liberal revolt which overthrew President Borrero in Dec., 1876; was proclaimed president with extraordinary powers; and in 1882 became practically dictator with the title of supreme chief. He was deposed and driven from the country, after several months of civil war, July, 1883.

Veit (fīt), Philipp. Born at Berlin, Feb. 13, 1793; died at Mainz, Dec. 18, 1877. A noted German painter, a grandson of Moses Mendelssohn. He was associated with Cornelius, Overbeck, and Schadow. Among his works are "Seven Years of Plenty" (Rome), "Christianity bringing Civilization to Germany" (Frankfort), "Assumption of Mary" (Frankfort cathedral), "Egyptian Darkness," etc.

Vela, Blasco Nuñez. See Nuñez Vela.

Velabrum (ve-lā'brum). An area in ancient Rome, between the Capitoline, the Palatine, and the Tiber, extending northeastward to the Forum Romanum. It was a marsh before the construction of the Cloaca Maxima. The marble arch built in honor of Severus by the merchants of the Velabrum formed a portal between it and the Forum Boarium on the south.

Velasco, José Antonio Manso de. See Manso de Velasco.

Velasco (vā-lās'kō), José Miguel de. Born at Santa Cruz de la Sierra about 1795; died there, 1859. A Bolivian general and politician. As vice-president he was twice acting president during the disorders of 1828-29; led a revolt in the South in 1838; was elected president after the fall of Santa Cruz in 1839, but was deposed in 1841; and was again president 1847-48 during a period of great disorder which culminated in his deposition.

Velasco, Juan de. Born at Riobamba (now in Ecuador) about 1727; died at Verona, Italy, 1819. A Jesuit historian. He was for many years a professor in the University of San Marcos at Lima. After the expulsion of his order in 1767, he lived at Faenza and Verona. His principal work is "Historia del reino de Quito" (first published in French 1840; Spanish edition, Quito, 1841-44). It includes an account of the Seyri kingdom of Quito.

Velasco, Luis de, Count of Santiago. Born at Toledo about 1500; died at Mexico City, July 31, 1564. A Spanish administrator, second viceroy of Mexico from Dec., 1550, until his death. He enforced the "New Laws," emancipating, it is said, 150,000 Indians; put down revolts of the Chichimecs; and fitted out Legazpe's expedition to the Philippine Islands.

Velasco, Luis de, Count of Santiago and Marquis of Salinas (from 1595). Born at Madrid, 1539; died at Seville, 1617 (?). A Spanish administrator, son of the preceding. He was viceroy of Mexico Jan. 25, 1590.-Nov., 1595; viceroy of Peru July 24, 1596.-Nov. 28, 1604; and again viceroy of Mexico July 2, 1607.-June 12, 1611. Subsequently he was president of the Council of the Indies. He was one of the best of the Spanish colonial rulers.

Velasquez (vā-lās'keth), Diego. Born at Cuéllar, Segovia, 1465 (or 1458 ?); died at Havana, Cuba, 1523 or 1524. A Spanish soldier and administrator. He went to Española with Columbus in 1493, and was prominent in the affairs of that island until 1511, when he was sent by Diego Columbus to coquer Cuba. He had many conflicts with the Indians, whose principal chief, Hatuey, was captured and burned in Feb., 1512; founded Santiago, Havana, and other towns; and continued to rule the island, which was only nominally subject to the audience of Santo Domingo. He furnished a vessel for the expedition of Cordova, which discovered Yucatan in 1517; fitted out Grijalva's expedition in 1518 (see Grijalva); and in 1519 sent Cortés to conquer Mexico. The latter, as soon as he had left the island, refused obedience to Velasquez, who, in March, 1520, sent Pánfilo de Narvaez to arrest him. Narvaez was defeated by Cortés, and all subsequent efforts of Velasquez to secure the rich conquests of Mexico for himself ended in failure. His death, it is said, was caused by vexation at his loss.

Velasquez (vā-lās'keth), or Velazquez (vā-lāth'keth), Diego Rodriguez de Silva. Born at Seville (baptized June 6, 1599); died at Madrid, Aug. 7, 1660. A celebrated Spanish painter. He was the son of Juan Rodriguez de Silva, but took his mother's name Velasquez. He was a pupil of Herrera el Viejo and of Pacheco whose daughter he married. He was patronized by Philip IV.; became court painter about 1623; visited Italy 1629-31; and for eighteen years painted portraits, landscapes, and historical and genre subjects in Madrid. From 1652 to 1660 he was quartermaster-general of the king's household, and died from over-fatigue in the preparations for the marriage of Louis XIV. and the infanta María Theresa. Among his principal works in his earlier manner are "The Water-Carrier of Seville" (Apsley House) and "The Adoration of the Shepherds" (National Gallery, London). Among his other works are "Los Borrachos," "Las Meninas," "Las Hileras," "The Expulsion of the Moriscos," "Forge of Vulcan" (Madrid Museum); "Joseph's Coat" (Escurial); "St. John the Evangelist" (London); "Boar Hunt," "Lot and his Daughters," "The Surrender of Breda," and a Crucifixion (de Prado); etc. His famous portraits are those of Philip IV., of which he painted about forty; Innocent X., Quevedo (Apsley House); Admiral Pulido Pareja (National Gallery, London); Olivares, Prince Baltasar Carlos, a series of portraits of jesters and dwarfs; etc. His genius was not fully known till about the beginning of the 19th century, when the royal pictures were collected in the Museo del Prado. About 275 pictures are attributed to him, of which 121 are in Great Britain, 7 in the United States, and others in different European galleries.

Velazquez. See Velasquez.

Velay (ve-lā'). An ancient territory and county of France, which formed part of Languedoc. Capital, Le Puy. It is comprised in the department of Haute-Loire.

Veldeke (vel'de-ke), Heinrich von. Born in the neighborhood of Maestricht, Holland; flourished at the end of the 12th century. A Middle High German poet, the founder of the German court epic poetry. He was of noble family and in the service of the Counts of Loos and Rineck, burgraves of Mayence. At the court of Cleves he began to write, between 1175 and 1184, his poem "Eneid" ("Æneid") after a French original. The manuscript was stolen from a Countess of Cleves, to whom it had been loaned, by a Count of Schwarzburg, who took it to Thuringia. In 1184, in Thuringia, Veldeke finally got back his work, and completed it at the court of the Count Palatine of Saxony, afterward the landgrave Hermann of Thuringia. An earlier work, supposed by some to have been written by another poet of the same name, is the "Legende van S. Servaes." He was, besides, the author of a number of lyrics. The "Æneid" was published by Behagel in 1882.

Velez-Rúbio (vā'leth-rō'bē-ō). A town in the province of Almería, Spain, situated on the Velez 54 miles west-southwest of Murcia. Population (1887), 10,437.

Velletri (vel-lā'trē). A town in the province of Rome, Italy, situated on a spur of the Alban Mountains 21 miles southeast of Rome. It was the ancient Velitræ, an important Latin town. Near it, May 19, 1849, Garibaldi defeated the Neapolitans. Population, 13,582.

Vellinghausen (vel'ling-hou-zen). A village in the province of Westphalia, Prussia, near the Lippe and near Soest. Here, July 15-16, 1761, Duke Ferdinand of Brunswick defeated the French under Broglie and Soubise.

Vellore (vel-lōr'). A town in North Arcot district, Madras, British India, situated on the Palar 75 miles west by south of Madras. It was the scene of a Sepoy mutiny in 1806. Population, with cantonment (1891), 44,925.

Venaissin (ve-nā-sān'). Comtat, or County of. An ancient county in the southeastern part of France, now included in the department of Vancluse. Capital, Carpentras. By Philip III. it was ceded to the popes in 1273; it was annexed to France in 1791.

Venantius. See Fortunatus.

Vendeans (ven-dē'anz). The natives or inhabitants of Vendée; specifically, the partisans of the royalist insurrection against the Revolution and the republic which was begun in western France in 1793, and the chief seat of which was in Vendée.

Vendée (voñ-dā'). A department of France, bounded by Loire-Inférieure and Maine-et-Loire on the north, Deux-Sèvres on the east, Charente-Inférieure and the Bay of Biscay on the south, and the Bay of Biscay on the west. Capital, La Roche-sur-Yon. It is divided into the "marsh" in the west, the "woodland" ("hocage") in the north, and the "plain" in the south. Vendée corresponds nearly to the former Bas-Poitou. It was the center of the royalist outbreak in the Revolution, and the scene of Bourbon disturbances in 1815 and 1832. Area, 2,688 square miles. Population (1891), 442,355.

Vendée, La, War of. The royalist war against the French republic which was carried on chiefly in Vendée and in Brittany. It broke out in Vendée in March, 1793, and reached its height in the Vendean victory at Sannur in June, 1793. The Vendeans under La Rochejaquelein suffered a decisive defeat by the republicans under Westermann and Marceau at Le Mans, Dec. 12, 1793. The war was confined in Brittany (war of the Chouans), and was suppressed in Vendée by Hoche in 1796. The chief Vendean leaders were Catheli-neau, La Rochejaquelein, Stofflet, and Charette. The complete submission of the Chouans was effected by Bonaparte in 1800.

Vendémiaire (võn-dâ-myâr'). [F., from L. vindemia, grape-gathering.] The name adopted in 1793 by the National Convention of the first French republic for the first month of the year. It consisted of 30 days, beginning in the years 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, 7 with Sept. 22; in 4, 8, 9, 10, 11, 13, 14 with Sept. 23; and in 12 with Sept. 24. The republican calendar came into use on 14th Vendémiaire, year 2 (Oct. 5, 1793).

Vendidad (ven-dê-dâd'). See Avesta.

Vendôme (võn-dôm'). A former countyship of France, made by Francis I. a duchy. It afterward gave name to a Bourbon line.

Vendôme. A town in the department of Loir-et-Cher, France, on the Loir 19 miles northwest of Blois; the Roman Vindocinnum. It contains the abbey church of the Trinity, the Lycée (formerly a college), a ruined castle, and a hôtel de ville. It was formerly the capital of a barony, later a duchy. Several contests between the French and Germans occurred in its vicinity in Dec., 1870. Population (1891), commune, 9,538.

Vendôme, César, Duc de. Born 1594; died 1665. An illegitimate son of Henry IV. of France and Gabrielle d'Estrées. He took part in the intrigues against Louis XIII. and Mazarin.

Vendôme, Column. A column in the Place Vendôme, Paris, erected by Napoleon in honor of the Grand Army in 1806-10. It was destroyed by the Commune in 1871, and was replaced in 1875.

Vendôme, François de, Duc de Beaufort. Born at Paris, 1616; killed at Candia, June 25, 1669. A French politician and admiral, grandson of Henry IV.; surnamed "roi des halles" ("king of the markets") on account of his audacity and the grossness of his language. He was a leader of the Fronde 1648-49.

Vendôme, Louis Joseph, Duc de; also called, until the death of his father, Duc de Penthièvre. Born at Paris, July 1, 1654; died at Viñaroz, in Catalonia, June 15, 1712. A famous French general, son of Louis, duc de Vendôme (1612-69). He served in the campaigns in the Low Countries, and at the victory of Marsaglia in 1693; commanded in Catalonia, and took Barcelona Aug. 10, 1697; commanded against Prince Eugene at Luzzara, Aug. 15, 1702; commanded in Tyrol, Piedmont, and Lombardy; was defeated at Oudenarde July 11, 1708; and defeated the Austrians in Spain at Villaviciosa, Dec. 10, 1710.

Vendôme, Philippe de. Born 1655; died 1727. A French general, brother of Louis Joseph de Vendôme. He was grand prior of the Maltese Order, and fought against the Dutch, Imperialists, etc.

Vendôme, Place. One of the principal squares of Paris, situated north of the Seine, and connected with the Place de l'Opéra by the Rue de la Paix, and with the Rue de Rivoli by the Rue Castiglione.

Venedey (ve-ne-dî), Jakob. Born at Cologne, May 24, 1805; died near Badenweiler, Feb. 8, 1871. A German publicist and historian. He lived long in exile in France after his participation in the celebration at Hambach in 1832, and was a member of the Frankfurt Parliament of 1848. His works include "Römertum, Christentum, Germanentum" (1840), "Irland" (1844), "England" (1845), "Geschichte des deutschen Volks" (1854-62), and biographies of Washington, Franklin, and others.

Venedig (ve-nâ'dig). The German name of Venice.

Venediger (ve-nâ'dig-er), Gross-. A peak of the Hohe Tauern, on the frontier of Tyrol and Salzburg, west of the Grossglockner; one of the highest summits of the Eastern Alps, famous for its view. Height, 12,005 feet.

Venetî (ven'e-tî). 1. In ancient history, a people dwelling near the head of the Adriatic, beyond the Po and Adige.—2. An ancient Celtic people dwelling in Brittany near the coast of the Bay of Biscay. They were subdued by Cæsar, after a severe maritime war, in 56 B. C.

Venetia (ve-nê'shiî). An ancient province of Italy, included, in general, by the Po, the Alps, and the Adriatic. It was afterward ruled by Venice; passed to Austria in 1797; and became finally united to Italy in 1866. As a modern compartment it comprises the provinces of Venice, Padua, Rovigo, Verona, Vicenza, Treviso, Belluno, Udine. Population (1892), 3,022,884.

Venetia. The Latin name of Venice.

Venetian (ve-nê'shan) Alps. A group of the Alps in northeastern Italy, south of the Carnic Alps, and between the valleys of the Tagliamento and Piave.

Venezuela (ven-e-zwê'lî): Sp., in full, Estados Unidos de Venezuela (es-tî'dôs ô-nê'dôs dâ vâ-nîd-wî'li). [F. or origin of name, see Onates.] A federal republic in the northern part of South America, bounded by the Caribbean Sea, British Guiana, Brazil, and Colombia. Capital, Caracas.

Branches of the Colombian Andes traverse the northwestern portion, and are continuous with a range along the northern coast called the Maritime Andes or Venezuelan Coast Range; south of these are the plains bordering the Orinoco and its tributaries, and including the vast stretches of grass-land called the llanos (which see); southeast of the Orinoco (Venezuelan Guiana) there are broken or mountainous lands. The southern and eastern boundaries are unsettled. The chief industries are agriculture (coffee, cacao, tobacco, etc.) in the mountain regions, and grazing on the llanos; gold, copper, etc., are mined in considerable quantities. The limits and names of the states and territories have been frequently changed. In 1899 the division into 20 states, which existed in 1864, was reestablished. The executive is vested in a president chosen for two years, and 7 responsible ministers. Congress consists of a senate and chamber of deputies. The prevailing language is Spanish, and the prevailing religion Roman Catholic; religious liberty is guaranteed by the constitution. Venezuela was discovered by Columbus in 1498, and was conquered and settled principally by agents of the commercial house of the Welser, who held a grant of the country from Charles V. during part of the 16th century. Later the greater part of it was included in the Spanish captain-generalship of Caracas. Insurrections broke out in 1810; were partially suppressed 1812-13 and 1815-16; and were finally successful in 1821. Until 1829 the country was included in the (original) republic of Colombia. The conflicting principles of the federalist and centralist parties have led to many civil wars and several changes of the constitution. Area (claimed), 507,900 square miles; actually held, probably less than 400,000 square miles. Population (census of 1891), 2,323,527. See Schomburgk Line.

Venezuela, Gulf of. See Maracûbo, Gulf of Venf. See Bent.

Venice (ven'is). A province of the kingdom of Italy. Area, 820 square miles. Population (1892), 379,254.

Venice (ven'is). [F. Venise, It. Venezia, G. Venedig, L. Venetia (from the Veneti).] A seaport, capital of the province of Venice, Italy, situated in the Lagune (lagoons) in a bay of the Adriatic, on 117 small islands, in lat. 45° 26' N., long 12° 20' E. The islands are separated by 250 canals and connected by 378 bridges. The city is celebrated for its situation, its palaces, and its works of art. Its trade is important, and it has manufactures of glass, gold- and silver-work, mosaic, silk, velvet, cotton, etc. The communication is mostly by water, the Grand Canal (which see) being the principal thoroughfare. The most famous church (see Mark, St., Basilica of) stands on the Piazza of St. Mark, where also are the Procuratie (or procurators' palaces), campanile (until its collapse in 1902), and clock-tower; while the adjoining Piazzetta is bordered by the palace of the doges (see Doge's Palace) and the former library (now the great hall of the Palazzo Reale or Procuratie Nuove). San Giovanni e Paolo, or San Zampolo, is a fine large pointed church with a light and lofty interior and a dome at the crossing. It was the usual burial-place of the doges. Among the finest tombs are those of Pietro Mocenigo, Michele Morosini, and Andrea Vendramin—the last a masterpiece of the early Renaissance. Santa Maria dei Frari, designed by Niccolò Pisano, and begun in 1250, is a large church of brick with a fine arched apse and a good campanile. The spacious and well-proportioned interior contains good paintings and interesting tombs. The church of San Giorgio degli Schiavoni, built in 1551 for the lay brotherhood of the Dalmatians, is famous for the series of highly realistic paintings by Carpaccio which adorn its interior. The Church of San Salvatore, outside a grotesque Renaissance production, but well proportioned and classical in the interior, contains some of the finest Renaissance tombs in Venice. There are many other notable churches. The Palazzo Contarini Fasani, on the Grand Canal, a small house, defaced though it is by restoration, presents the richest example of Venetian 15th-century pointed work. The Palazzo Foscarini is the finest example of Venetian pointed architecture of the 15th century. The Palazzo Vendramin-Calergi, built in 1481, is the finest example of a private building of the early Renaissance in Venice. Among other objects of interest are the Bridge of Sighs (which see), the Quay Riva degli Schiavoni, the Rialto (which see), and the Academy of Fine Arts. The Venetian islands are said to have become refuges from the Teutonic conquerors as early as the 5th and 6th centuries. The dogate was instituted in or about 697. The first permanent settlement was made on the site of Venice in the 9th century. It occupied an intermediate position between the Byzantine empire and that of the West. The title of Duke of Dalmatia was assumed by the doge about 997. The republic of Venice became one of the greatest commercial powers of the world, especially after the partition of the Byzantine empire in 1204, in which it played a leading part, sharing the spoils. It had a long and bitter rivalry with Genoa. It was governed by a doge, great council, senate, and after 1310 by the Council of Ten. In the 14th and 15th centuries it acquired Treviso, Vicenza, Padua, Verona, Udine, Brescia, Bergamo, and other places in northeastern Italy. It was at its height in the 14th century, and held various possessions in Dalmatia, Greece, and the Levant; became celebrated in art, especially in the 16th century (Titian, Tintoretto, Paolo Veronese, Giorgione, Bellini, Sansovino, Palladio, Da Ponte); and lost to the Turks in the 15th and 16th centuries its possessions in the Morea, with Eubœa, Cyprus, Corfu, etc. The League of Cambray was formed against Venice in 1508. Venice took a leading part in the victory of Lepanto in 1571; lost Crete to the Turks in 1669; and conquered the Morea under Morosini 1685-87. Napoleon put an end to the republic in 1797. Its territories were ceded to Austria by the treaty of Campo Formio in 1797; were ceded to the kingdom of Italy in 1805, and ceded back to Austria in 1814; and Venetia became part of the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom in 1815. The republic of Venice, under the leadership of Manin, was proclaimed in 1848. The city was besieged and taken by Austria 1848-49. Venetia (with Venice) was ceded to the kingdom of Italy in 1866. Population (1901), commune, 151,840.

Venice, Gulf of. The northwestern arm of the Adriatic Sea.

Venice as Queen of the Sea. An effective and skilfully painted allegorical picture by Tintoretto, on the ceiling of the Sala del Collegio in the ducal palace at Venice.

Venice of the East. A name occasionally given to Bangkok.

Venice of the North. A name sometimes given to Stockholm and to Amsterdam.

Venice of the West. An occasional name of Glasgow.

Venice Preserved, or a Plot Discovered. A tragedy by Otway, printed in 1682. The plot is from St. Réal's "Histoire de la Conjuración du Marquis de Bedamar."

Venlo, or Venloo (ven-lô'). A town in the province of Limburg, Netherlands, situated on the Meuse in lat. 51° 23' N., long. 6° 9' E. It has varied manufactures and an extensive trade in swine. It was formerly strongly fortified. In 1473 it was taken by Charles the Bold, and in 1581 by Maximilian I. It was besieged by Charles V. in 1543, and capitulated under favorable conditions (the "Accord of Venloo"); was taken by the Dutch in 1568, by the Duke of Parma in 1588, and by Prince Henry of Orange in 1632; was taken from the French by the Allice under Marlborough in 1702; fell to Austria by the peace of Baden in 1714; was restored to the Netherlands in 1715; was taken by the French Oct. 26, 1794, and incorporated in France in 1801; was restored to the Netherlands by the peace of Paris in 1814; was taken by the Belgians Nov., 1830; and was again restored in 1839. Population (1894), est., 15,921.

Venn (ven), or the High Venn. A desolate plateau chiefly in the Rhine Province, Prussia, on the frontier of Belgium, near the towns Montjoie and Malmedy. Elevation, about 2,000 feet.

Venn, John. Born 1834; died 1883. An English writer and lecturer on moral science. He graduated at Caius College, Cambridge, in 1857, and was ordained in 1858. Among his works are "The Logic of Chance, etc." (1866), "On Some of the Characteristics of Belief, Scientific and Religious" (1870), "Symbolic Logic" (1881), "Principles of Empirical or Inductive Logic" (1889).

Vennachar (ven'a-âhâr). Loch. An expansion of the river Teith in Perthshire, Scotland, east of Loch Katrine. Length, 3½ miles.

Venosa (vâ-nô'sâ). A town in the province of Potenza, Italy, 23 miles north of Potenza; the Roman Venusia. It was the birthplace of Horace. Population, about 8,000.

Venta, or Venta Belgarum (ven'tî bel-gâ-rum). The Roman name of Winchester.

Ventimiglia (ven-tê-mêl'yâ). A seaport in the province of Porto-Maurizio, Italy, situated on the Mediterranean, close to the French frontier, 17 miles east-northeast of Nice. Population (1881), 4,195.

Ventnor (vent'nôr). A watering-place in the Isle of Wight, England, situated on the southern coast 9 miles south-southeast of Newport; noted for its mild climate. Population (1891), 5,817.

Ventose (võn-tôz'). [F., 'the windy.'] The name adopted in 1793 by the National Convention of the first French republic for the sixth month of the year. It consisted of 30 days, beginning in the years 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, 7 with Feb. 19; in 4, 8, 9, 10, 11, 13 with Feb. 20; and in 12 with Feb. 21.

Ventoux (võn-tô'), Mont. An outlying summit of the Alps, in southeastern France, northeast of Avignon. Height, 6,270 feet.

Venus (vê'nus). 1. In Roman mythology, the goddess of beauty and love, more especially sensual love. Venus was of little importance as a Roman goddess until, at a comparatively late period, she was identified with the Greek Aphrodite. She is represented as the highest ideal of female beauty, and was naturally a favorite subject with poets and artists, some of her statues (see below) being among the noblest remains of classical sculpture.

2. The most brilliant of the planets, being frequently visible to the naked eye by daylight. It is the second from the sun and next within the earth's orbit, performing its sidereal revolution in 224,7008 days; its distance from the sun is 0.723332 that of the earth. The synodical revolution is made in 584 days. Its orbit is the most nearly circular of those of the major planets, the greatest equation of the center being only 47 3/4". The inclination of the orbit to the ecliptic is 3° 23' 5"; and the earth passes through the ascending node on Dec. 7; The mass of Venus (which is not very closely ascertained) is about 815/876 that of the sun, or 1/11 that of the earth. Its diameter is a little smaller than that of our planet, which subtends an angle of 2 × 8".827 at the sun's center, while Venus at the same distance has a semidiameter of 8".68 by the mean of the best night measures, or 8".40 according to the observations at its transit over the sun. Taking the mean of these (which are affected in opposite ways by irradiation), or 8".64, we find the diameter of Venus about 3/4 that of the earth. Its volume is about 1/10, its density about 1/2, and gravity at its surface about 1/2 the same quantities for the earth. It receives 1.9 as much light and heat from the sun as we, and the tidal action of the latter is about 5.8 times as great as upon the earth. The period of rotation of Venus is set down in many books as 23 hours and 50 minutes; but recent observations have led some astronomers to the confident conclusion that the true period falls short but a little of 225 days, so that day and night last for many years. No satellite of Venus has ever been seen. Numerous observations of one were reported in the 18th century; but all these have been fairly shown to be fixed stars, except one, which was probably an asteroid. The symbol for Venus is ♀, supposed to represent the goddess's mirror.

Venus, Mountain of, or Venusberg. The Hörselberg, between Eisenach and Gotha, within whose caverns (the Hörselloch), according to medieval legend, Venus held her court with heathen splendor and revelry. Of those who, charmed by music and sensuous allurements, entered her abode, none ever returned except Tannhäuser. See Tannhäuser.

Venus and Adonis. A poem by Shakspere, published in 1593.

Venus and Adonis. 1. A painting by Guercino (1647), in the Museum at Dresden. Venus comes suddenly on the body of Adonis, who lies with torn flank, and makes lively manifestation of grief. Cupid drags up the boar from one side, by the ear.

2. A painting by Rubens, in the Hermitage Museum, St. Petersburg. In the center of a glade, Adonis, bearing his hunting-spear, struggles with Venus and Cupid, who strive to hold him back. In the background are seen Venus's chariot drawn by swans, and several hunting-dogs.

3. A painting by Paolo Veronese, in the Royal Museum at Madrid. Venus reclines, holding in her lap the head of the sleeping Adonis.

Venusberg (vā'nūs-berg). See Venus, Mountain of.

Venus Callipyge (ka-lip'i-jē). [Gr. καλλιπύγη, with beautiful buttocks.] A late Greek statue, in the Museo Nazionale, Naples. The title is a misnomer, as there is nothing of Venus about the figure, which stands with the weight on the left leg, and with the uplifted left hand raises the drapery from behind, at the same time looking over her right shoulder.

Venus Genetrix (jen'e-triks). [L., 'she who has borne or produced.'] 1. A Roman copy of a Greek original held to represent a celebrated type by Alcámenes, in the Louvre, Paris. The goddess is clad in a very light Ionian tunic, and with the raised right arm lifts her himation from behind toward her head, forming the Greek gesture symbolic of marriage. The left hand extends the apple.

2. An antique marble statue, in the Vatican Museum, held to be an excellent copy of the bronze cult-statue by Arcesilaus which stood in the temple of Venus on the Forum Julium. The figure is fully draped in very thin, clinging drapery: she extends an apple with her left hand, and with the right raises her mantle over the shoulder toward the head—the symbolic marriage-gesture.

Venusia (ve-nū'si-ā). The ancient name of Venosa.

Venus of Arles. A Greek statue found at Arles in 1651, now in the Louvre, Paris. The goddess is represented standing, undraped to the hips, with the head slightly inclined toward the left.

Venus of Capua. A beautiful antique statue, of the type of the famous Venus of Melos, in the Museo Nazionale, Naples. The goddess wears a stephane, and is undraped to her hips. It is a Roman copy of a Greek original.

Venus of Cnidus. The best antique reproduction of the type of the famous statue by Praxiteles, in the Vatican, Rome. The figure is nude; the drapery is held in the left hand, and falls over a beautiful vase. The existing drapery about the legs is of tin painted white. The arms are restored.

Venus of Medici. An antique Greek original statue of marble, probably of the time of Augustus, in the Tribuna of the Uffizi, Florence. It is a very graceful, highly finished figure of the goddess, undraped, as Anadyomene, with her arms held before her body, and a dolphin to her left. While without the dignity of earlier Greek work, it has long ranked as a canon of female beauty.

Venus of Melos. A famous Greek statue in the Louvre, Paris, perhaps the most admired single existing work of antiquity. It was found in 1820 in the island of Melos, and in date appears to fall between the time of Phidias and that of Praxiteles, or about 400 B. C. The statue represents a majestic woman, undraped to the hips, standing with the weight on the right foot and with the head turned slightly toward the left. The arms are broken off, and there is a dispute as to their original position. Also called the Venus of Milo.

Venus of Syracuse. A Greek statue of Venus Anadyomene, of the 3d century B. C., in the Museo Nazionale at Syracuse, Sicily. The statue is headless; the only drapery is a piece of light tissue blown back by the wind and retained by the right hand.

Venus of the Capitol. A notable Greek original statue, in the Capitoline Museum, Rome. The goddess is undraped, with her arms in the position of those of the Venus of Medici, and her drapery thrown over a vase beside her. The motive is a variation of the type of the Venus of Cnidus.

Venus of the Hermitage. A noted antique statue of Parian marble, found in Rome in 1859, and now in the Hermitage, St. Petersburg. It is a very close replica, but slightly restored, of the Venus of Medici, but is somewhat less affected in pose, though harder in type.

Venus of the Shell. A painting by Titian (1520), in Bridgewater House, London. The goddess wrings her hair as she rises from the sea, in which she is still immersed to her thighs. The modeling is remarkable, despite the strong light on all sides, and the color is admirable. The picture has its name from the small shell floating beside the figure.

Venus of Urbino. A masterpiece by Titian, in the Tribuna of the Uffizi, Florence: a very graceful figure reclining on a white-draped couch, with beautifully warm and transparent flesh-tints. It is the portrait of Eleonora Gonzaga, duchess of Urbino.

Vêpres Siciliennes (vâprê-sê-lyen'), Les. [F., 'Sicilian Vespers' (which see).] 1. An opera by Verdi, produced at Paris in 1855, and in England as "I Vespri Siciliani" in 1859.—2. A play by Casimir Delavigne.

Vera (vâ'râ), Augusto. Born at Amelia, Umbria, Italy, May 4, 1813; died at Naples, July 13, 1855. An Italian Hegelian philosopher, professor at Naples. He translated various works of Hegel into French, and wrote "Problème de la certitude" (1845), "An Inquiry into Speculative and Experimental Science" (1856), "Essai de philosophie hégélienne" (1864), etc.

Vera Cruz (ve'râ kröz; Sp. pron. vâ'râ krôth). [True cross.] A maritime state of Mexico, bounded by the Gulf of Mexico and the states of Tamaulipas, San Luis Potosí, Hidalgo, Puebla, Oajaca, Chiapas, and Tabasco. Capital, Jalapa. The surface is mountains, except the coast-plate. Area, 27,454 square miles. Population (1895), 855,975.

Vera Cruz. A seaport in the state of Vera Cruz, Mexico, situated on the Gulf of Mexico in lat. 19° 12' N., long. 96° 9' W.; defended by the castle of San Juan de Ulúa. It is the principal seaport of Mexico, and the port of export for over half of all Mexican products. It was founded by Cortés near the present site (see Villa Rica); was made a city in 1615; was bombarded and taken by the French in 1838, and by the Americans under Scott in 1847; and was taken by the Spaniards in 1861. Population (1894), 19,165.

Veragua (vâ-râ'gwâ), or Veraguas (vâ-râ'gwâs). [From the name of a river, or perhaps of an Indian town.] A region in the western part of the Isthmus of Panama, near the Gulf of Chiriquí. It was named by Columbus, who discovered it in 1502 and attempted to found a settlement there, but was driven off by the Indians. It was included in Castilla del Oro, granted to Diego de Nicuesa in 1509, and he endured great sufferings while attempting to colonize it. Maria de Toledo, acting for her son, Luis Columbus, sent an expedition to conquer Veragua in 1535, but the country was abandoned after nearly all the colonists had died. It was partly settled during the colonial period, and for a time formed a province of New Granada. It is now included in the department of Panama.

Veragua, Dukes of. The successors to the honors of Christopher Columbus. In 1536 Luis Columbus abandoned his claims to the viceroyalty of the Indies, receiving in return the title of duke of Veragua, with a grant of twenty-five leagues square in Veragua, and the island of Jamaica, in fee. In 1556 he was deprived of the fiefs, but retained the title, with the honorary title of admiral of the Indies, and a pension. Diego Columbus, the great-grandson of the discoverer, died childless in 1578, and with him the male line of Columbus came to an end. A lawsuit for the succession to the titles followed: it lasted thirty years, and was settled in favor of the descendants of Isabel, sister of Luis Columbus. This line ceased in 1733, and the title, after new litigations, was settled on the descendants of Francesca, sister of the Diego Columbus who had died in 1578. The present Duke of Veragua (born 1837) visited the United States in 1892, and was received with high honors as the representative of the family.

Verazano. See Ferrazano.

Verboeckhoven (ver-bök'hō-ven), Eugène Joseph. Born at Warneton, Belgium, July 8, 1798; died at Brussels, Jan. 20, 1881. A Belgian painter of animals.

Verbruggen (ver-brug'en), John. Died 1708. An English actor. He was the original Oronoko, and so famous as Alexander that he was sometimes called by that name.

Verbruggen, Mrs. (Susanna Perceval Mountfort). Born 1669; died 1701. An English actress. She married William Mountfort, an actor, about 1686, and after his death married Verbruggen. She was a brilliant actress of light comedy. Cibber has celebrated her in his "Apology."

Vercellæ (vêr-sel'ê). The ancient name of Vercelli.

Vercelli (ver-chel'ê). A town in the province of Novara, Italy, situated on the Sesia 35 miles west by south of Milan: the ancient Vercellæ, capital of the Libici. Near it are the Raudian Fields. It had a university in the middle ages. The Church of Sant' Andrea, of the early 13th century, is a notable building combining Romanesque and Pointed arches. The walls are of brick; the pillars, angle-quoins, and other important details, and the entire façade, of stone. The façade has three sculptured doorways and two galleries of columns, with slender rectangular towers. At the crossing there is an octagonal lantern surrounded by six turrets. Population (1881), 20,165.

Vercelli, Battle of. See Raudian Fields.

Vercelli Book. A manuscript collection of early English poetry and Anglo-Saxon legends and homilies. It contains Cynewulf's "Elene." It was discovered by Dr. Friedrich Blunne at Vercelli, Italy, in 1822.

Vercingetorix (vêr-sin-jet'ô-riks). Put to death about 45 B. C. A heroic chief of the Arverni in Gaul, the leader of the great rebellion against the Romans in 52 B. C. He gained various successes against Caesar, but was besieged by him in Alesia and surrendered in 52. He was exhibited in Caesar's triumph in Rome in 46, and then by Caesar's order beheaded.

Verdun (ver-dun'). A fortified town in the department of Meuse, France, situated on the Meuse in lat. 49° 9' N.; the ancient Verodunum in Gaul. It manufactures confectionery, liquors, etc.; has a cathedral of the 12th century; and is strongly fortified. In the 10th century it passed to the German Empire; was made a free imperial city; was occupied by Henry II. of France in 1552, and with its territory was formally annexed to France in 1648; was held a short time by the Prussians in 1792; and capitulated to the Prussians in Nov., 1870. Population (1891), commune, 18,852.

Verdun, Treaty of. A treaty made at Verdun in 843 by the sons of Louis le Débonnaire. Lothaire was confirmed as emperor, and received Italy and the region lying in general west of the Rhine and Alps and east of the Rhone, Saône, Meuse, and Schelde. Ludwig the German received the region between the Rhine and the Elbe (the nucleus of Germany); and Charles the Bald obtained the region west of Lothaire's dominions (the nucleus of France).

On his (Louis the Pious's) death the sons flew to arms, and the first of the dynastic quarrels of modern Europe was fought out on the field of Fontenay. In the partition treaty of Verdun which followed, the Teutonic principle of equal division among heirs triumphed over the Roman one of the transmission of an indivisible empire.

Bryce, Holy Roman Empire, p. 77.

Verdunois (ver-dü-nwâ'). An ancient territory of eastern France, whose capital was Verdun. With the Pays Messin it formed one of the small governments of France prior to 1790. The name Verdunois was also given to a small district in Gascony, southern France, near Verdun-sur-Garonne.

Vergil, or Virgil (vêr'jil) (L. Publius Vergilius Maro). Born in Andes, near Mantua, Cisalpine Gaul, Oct. 15, 70 B. C.; died at Brundisium, Italy, Sept. 21, 19 B. C. A famous Roman epic, didactic, and idyllic poet. He studied at Cremona, Mediolanum, Neapolis, and Rome, where he devoted himself to rhetoric, philosophy, and poetry. In 41 his paternal estate near Mantua was confiscated for the benefit of the soldiers which had assisted Octavian in the civil war against Brutus and Cassius; but he was later indemnified through the intercession of Mæcenas. He enjoyed the friendship and patronage of Asinius Pollio, Mæcenas (to whom he was introduced about 40), and Octavian (Augustus). He was an intimate friend of Horace, whom he introduced to Mæcenas. About 37 he settled at Rome; his later years were spent chiefly in Campania. His works include "Eclogues" or "Bucolics" (written 42-37), "Georgics" (written about 37-30), and the "Æneid." The first printed edition of Vergil appeared at Rome about 1469.

Vergil, or Virgil (vêr'jil), Polydore. Born at Urbino, Italy, about 1470; died there, 1555. An Italian-English ecclesiastic and historian. He was sent to England as deputy collector of Peter's pence by the Pope in 1501; was presented to an English living in 1503; and in 1504 was appointed the Bishop of Hereford's proxy on his translation to the see of Bath and Wells. He was collated to the prebend of Scamblesby in Lincoln in 1507; was naturalized in 1510; and was collated to the prebend of Oxgate in St. Paul's in 1513. He was imprisoned for a short time about 1515 on the charge of slandering Wolsey. He returned to Italy about 1550. His chief work is "Historiæ Angliæ libri xvi" (1534); a twenty-seventh book was added in the third edition, 1555.

Vergil the Magician. The legendary form which the historical Vergil assumed in the middle ages.

Vermont (ver-mont'). ['Green mountain,'] One of the New England States of the United States of America, extending from lat. 42° 44' to 45° 1'

N., and from long. 71° 38' to 73° 25' W. Capital, Montpelier. It is bounded by Quebec on the north, New Hampshire (separated by the Connecticut) on the east, Massachusetts on the south, and New York (largely separated by Lake Champlain) on the west. It is traversed from north to south by the Green Mountains. It is an agricultural State, and is also noted for its quarries of granite and marble. It has 14 counties, sends 2 senators and 2 representatives to Congress, and has 4 electoral votes. The first to explore it was Champlain (1609); the first settlement was made at Brattleboro in 1724. It was claimed by New Hampshire, and called at first the "New Hampshire Grants," and was afterward claimed by New York. Its "Green Mountain Boys," under the lead of Ethan Allen, took an active part in the Revolutionary War; and it was the scene of the battle of Bennington. It formed a constitution and proclaimed its independence in 1777, and was admitted to the Union in 1791. It was the starting-point of Canadian raids in 1837, and later of Fenian raids. Length, 158 miles. Area, 9,565 square miles. Population (1900), 343,641.

Vernet (vern), Jules. Born at Nantes, France, Feb. 8, 1828. A French novelist. He was educated at Nantes, and afterward studied law at Paris, but ultimately devoted himself to literature. After turning out a number of moderately successful plays, he struck a new vein in his scientific romances, which have gained a world-wide popularity. They include "Cinq semaines en ballon" ("Five Weeks in a Balloon," 1863), "Voyage au centre de la terre" ("Journey to the Center of the Earth," 1864), "De la terre à la lune" ("A Trip to the Moon," 1865), "Vingt mille lieues sous les mers" ("Twenty Thousand Leagues under the Sea," 1870), "L'île mystérieuse" ("The Mysterious Island," 1870), "Voyage autour du monde en quatre-vingt jours" ("Round the World in Eighty Days," 1872), "Michel Strogoff" (1876), "Le rayon vert" (1882), etc.

Vernet, Claude Joseph, called Joseph. Born at Avignon, France, Aug. 14, 1712; died at Paris, Dec. 23, 1789. A French marine- and landscape-painter, son and pupil of Antoine Vernet (1689-1753). He studied at Rome in 1732, and settled in Paris in 1753, after painting at many European courts. He painted by royal order a series of French seaports.

Vernet, Émile Jean Horace, called Horace. Born at Paris, June 30, 1789; died there, Jan. 17, 1863. A distinguished French genre- and battle-painter, son and pupil of A. C. H. Vernet, and pupil of Moreau and Vincent. He was decorated for bravery at the defense of the Barrière de Clichy in 1820; was director of the French school at Rome 1827-39; and was employed 1836-42 in painting for the gallery of Versailles. Most of his pictures after 1836 were of Arab life. They include "Dog of the Regiment," "Horse with the Trumpet," "Grenadier of Waterloo," battles of Jemappes, Valmy, Hanau, Bouvines, Montmirail, Jena, Friedland, Wagram, Isly, "Campaign of Constantine," "Capture of the Smala of Abd-el-Kader," "Barrier of Clichy," "Bridge of Arcola," "Smala," "Siege of Antwerp," various Moorish scenes, "Judith," "Rachel," scenes from Molière's plays, etc.

Verneuil (ver-nêy'). A town in the department of Eure, France, situated on the Avre 49 miles south by west of Rouen. Here, Aug. 17, 1424, the English under the Duke of Bedford defeated the French. Population (1891), commune, 4,270.

Verneuil, Catherine Henriette de Balzac d'Entragues, Marquise de. Born at Orléans in 1579; died at Paris in 1633. A mistress of Henry IV. She was false to him, but he was infatuated with her, though he finally broke with her. Later she was accused of having been a moral accomplice in his assassination, but nothing was proved against her.

Vernéville (ver-nâ-vêl'). A village west-northwest of Metz. The heights east of the village were the scene of hard fighting in the battle of Gravelotte, Aug. 18, 1870. The French center was here attacked by the German 9th army corps.

Vernier (ver-nyâ'), Pierre. Born at Ornans, France, about 1580; died there, Sept. 14, 1637. A French mathematician, noted as the inventor of the vernier (named for him). He wrote "Construction, usage, et propriétés du quadrant nouveau de mathématiques" (1631), etc.

Vernon (ver-nôn'). [ML, Verno.] A town in the department of Eure, France, situated on the Seine 30 miles southeast of Rouen. Population (1891), commune, 8,288.

Vernon (vêr'non), Diana or Di. A high-spirited girl with a love for nautic sports, the heroine of Scott's "Rob Roy."

Vernon (vêr'non), Edward. Born at Westminster, Nov. 12, 1684; died at Naeton, Suffolk, England, Oct. 29 or 30, 1757. An English admiral. He entered the navy in 1701; served in the War of the Spanish Succession 1701-33; and entered Parliament in 1722. He bombarded and took Porto Bello in 1733; was recalled before Cartagena in 1743; and was struck from the list of admirals in 1746 for publishing a couple of pamphlets against the admiralty.

Vernon, Jane Marchant Fisher. Born in England about 1796; died at New York, June 4, 1869. An English-American actress. She came to America in 1827, and shortly after married George Vernon, an actor, who died in about three years. Her best parts in her later years were Mrs. Hardcastle, Mrs. Malaprop, Tabitha Stork, and similar characters.

Verocchio, or Verrocchio (vâ-rôk'kê-ô), Andrea (Andrea Cioni di Michele). Born at Florence, 1435; died at Venice, 1488. An Italian sculptor, the most noted pupil of Donatello. He was early apprenticed to Giuliano Verocchio, a goldsmith, from whom he took his name (Verocchio, the true eye). He was a painter as well as a sculptor, but only one picture remains, the "Baptism of our Lord," in the Accademia in Florence. In 1467 he did compartments of the door of the sacristy of the Duomo in Florence for Luca della Robbia. From 1473 to 1476 (pontificate of Sixtus IV.) he was in Rome. Immediately after his return to Florence in 1476, Verocchio modeled and cast his famous little statue of David. From 1471 to 1472 he worked upon the mausoleum of Giovanni and Piero de' Medici for the sacristy of San Lorenzo. The last work upon which he was employed was the equestrian statue of Bartolommeo Colleoni (or Coloneo), captain-general of the Venetian forces, who died at Bergamo, leaving his silver, furniture, arms, horses, and the sum of 216,000 florins to the republic of Venice, on condition that his statue should be set up in the Piazza di San Marco (it was really placed in the Piazza of the Scuola di San Marco). Verocchio had nearly finished the horse when he died. The Colleoni was later finished by Leopardi. Lorenzo di Credi, Pergino, and Leonardo da Vinci were his pupils.

Veroli (vâ-rô-lê). [L. Verula.] A town in the province of Rome, Italy, situated 49 miles east-southeast of Rome. Population (1881), 3,835.

Veromandui (ver-ô-man'dû-i). An ancient people of Belgic Gaul, who lived in the vicinity of St.-Quentin.

Verona (vâ-rô-nâ). A province in the compartimento of Venetia, Italy. Area, 1,188 square miles. Population (1892), 425,697.

Verona. The capital of the province of Verona, Italy, situated on the Adige in lat. 45° 26' N., long. 11° E. It is strongly fortified. It contains a Roman amphitheater, deprived almost completely of its ornamental exterior facing, but remaining practically perfect in its vaults and cavea, and still in current use. It is 3 stories (98 feet) high, built of white and red marble with brick substructions, has 45 tiers of seats, and can seat 22,000 people. The greater axis is 506 feet, the less 403; the arena is 248 by 145 feet. The arena could be flooded for the naumachy. It was built about 200 A. D. The Church of Sant' Anastasia is one of the finest Italian brick churches of the 13th century, with a beautiful recessed double-arched sculptured portal. The characteristically Italian interior has very high wide nave-arches; the triforium is represented merely by an open clerestory in every bay, and the clerestory by an ornamented sexfoil. The Castel Vecchio is a large battlemented citadel built by Can Grande II. della Scala in 1355, now used as a barracks. It is connected with the arsenal by a picturesque contemporaneous battlemented and turreted bridge of brick, with unequal arches, the largest with a span of over 160 feet. The cathedral is, as it now stands, of the 12th century. The chief entrance-porch has four columns, two of them resting on griffins, and superposed arches; the portal is guarded by the Paladins of Charlemagne. The interior has clustered columns and pointed arches, with some excellent frescoes. The chapel of Sant' Agata contains a beautiful medieval sculptured shrine; the fine Renaissance choir, with curved colonnade, is by Sammichele. The Lombard baptistery has a great octagonal marble font, curiously sculptured with reliefs and arcades. The cloister, with coupled columns, retains a fine Roman mosaic and a column of the temple of Minerva. The palace of the Scaligers is now used for the law-courts and jail. It has a picturesque court and staircase, and a fine brick campanile of the 13th century (272 feet high). Below, it is plain and square; above, it has in each face a fine triple arch beneath a bold corbeled cornice. The crown is a recessed octagonal-arcaded lantern of two stories. The tombs of the Scaligers form a unique assemblage of family tombs of the 13th and 14th centuries. The two chief of these monuments are those of Mastino II. and of Can Signorino della Scala. Verona was a Roman colony and important city, and was the residence of Theodoric (Dietrich of Bern, i. e. Verona), at times the residence of Lombard kings. It was ruled by the Scala family in the 13th and 14th centuries; was conquered by Venice in 1405; and played an important part in the history of art in the 15th and 16th centuries. The city was taken by the French in 1796; was ceded to Austria in 1797; and was ceded to Italy in 1866. It was one of the four famous fortresses of the Quadrilateral. It was the birthplace of Cæcilius, Cornelius Nepos, Vitruvius, and the elder Pliny. Population (1892), 69,604.

Verona, Congress of. A congress of representatives from the principal European governments, held at Verona Oct.-Dec., 1822; occasioned by the disturbances in Spain and southeastern Europe. It was attended by the monarchs of Prussia, Austria, Russia, and the Two Sicilies and Sardinia the Duke of Wellington, the Duke of Montmorency, and others. Metternich presided. The chief result was the armed intervention of France in Spain in 1823.

Veronese (vâ-rô-nû'ze), Paul (Paolo Cagliari). Born at Verona, 1528; died at Venice, April 19, 1588. A celebrated Italian painter of the Venetian school. His first considerable commissions were executed at Mantua. In 1556 he went to Venice, where he remained. His first commission here was the "Coronation of the Virgin," and four other subjects, for the Convent of St. Sebastian. In 1563 Titian supported his claims to the award of the decoration of the Library of St. Mark. In 1565 Veronese went to Rome. In 1573 he was called before the Inquisition to answer a charge of blasphemy for introducing in a "Last Supper," painted for the friars of St. John and St. Paul, irrelevant and decorative figures. He was obliged to paint out his dwarfs, German soldiers, etc., and to paint the picture as it hangs in the Academy. After the fire of 1577 he was commissioned to paint the ceiling of the council-chamber in the doge's palace. His works include "Marriage at Cana" (Louvre), "Feast in the House of Simon" (Louvre), "Europa and the Bull" (London), "Leda and the Swan" (London), "Death of Adonis" (London), "Supper at Emmaus," "Venice Enthroned," "Calling of St. Andrew," "Presentation of the Family of Darius to Alexander," "St. Helena's Vision" (both the last named in the National Gallery, London), and many others.

Veronica (ve-ron'i-kā), Saint. [A corrupted form of Berenice, Gr. Βερενίκη, a woman's name. The name suggested the words verum icon, 'true picture,' and gave rise to the fable.] In Christian legend, a woman of Jerusalem, said to have died at Rome, who gave to Jesus on his way to Calvary a handkerchief to wipe his brow. He took it, and upon it was miraculously left an impression of his face (the so-called Veronica). The legend probably arose in the 13th century. She is commemorated on Feb. 4.

Verplanck (ver-plang'k), Gulian Crommelin. Born at New York, Aug. 6, 1786; died there, March 18, 1870. An American author, politician, and lawyer. He graduated at Columbia in 1801; was admitted to the bar; and settled as a lawyer at New York. He was in 1821 appointed professor of the evidences of revealed religion and moral science in the Protestant Episcopal General Theological Seminary at New York, a position which he occupied four years. He was a Democratic member of Congress from New York 1825-1833. He published, with William C. Bryant and Robert C. Sands, an annual entitled the "Talisman" (1827-29). Among his works are "Bucktail Bards" (1819), "Evidences of Revealed Religion" (1824), "Doctrine of Contracts" (1825), "Discourses and Addresses" (1833), and "Shakespeare's Plays, with his Life, with Critical Introduction and Notes" (1847).

Verrazano (ver-rät-sä'nō), or Verrazani (ver-rät-sä'nē), or Verazzano (vā-rät-sä'nō), or Verrazzano (ver-rät-sä'nō), Giovanni da (or de). Born in Italy about 1480; died probably in 1527. An Italian navigator. He was a corsair in the French service; left France in command of a French exploring expedition in 1523; and explored the coast of North America from North Carolina to Newfoundland in 1524, discovering New York and Narragansett bays.

Verres (ver'éz), Caius. Put to death by Antony 43 B. C. A Roman official, pretor in 73, who, as governor of Sicily 73-71, plundered the island of property, art treasures, etc. He was brought to trial in 70 B. C., and was defended by Hortensius and prosecuted by Cicero. The trial resulted in his voluntary exile in Marseilles. Of the six orations against Verres composed by Cicero, only the first was actually delivered.

Verria. See Feria.

Verrill (ver'il), Addison Emory. Born at Greenwood, Maine, Feb. 9, 1839. An American zoologist, professor at Yale since 1864. He has published many scientific papers, chiefly in the "American Journal of Science."

Versailles (ver-sälz'; F. pron. ver-sä'y'). The capital of the department of Seine-et-Oise, France, situated 11 miles west-southwest of Paris. It contains a famous royal palace, consisting of a comparatively inconsiderable central portion built by Louis XIII., and of wide-reaching wings and connected structures, added chiefly by Louis XIV. The garden front is a quarter of a mile long, with only two stories and an attic; so that, although broken by a large projection in the middle, the general effect is monotonous. The court front is more diversified, though injured by the insertion of two neo-classical pavilions by Louis Philippe. A great part of the palace is now occupied by the Museum of French History, consisting chiefly of paintings; but some of the apartments are still preserved with the fittings of a royal residence. The chapel is well proportioned and sumptuous. The great gallery, called the Galerie des Glaces, is one of the finest rooms existing; it is 240 by 35 feet, and 42 high, adorned with mirrors and gilding, and with ceiling-paintings by Lebrun representing the triumphs of Louis XIV. Here King William of Prussia was proclaimed German emperor in 1871. The council-chamber, the bedroom of Louis XIV., the antechamber of the Œil de Bœuf, the Petits Appartements of the queen, and the theater are all historic and highly interesting. The gardens are the finest of their formal kind; they abound with monumental fountains profusely adorned with groups of sculpture, and supplied the model for those of half the palaces of Europe. (See Triannon.) Versailles was the meeting-place of the States-General in 1789. A popular tumult, Oct. 5-6, 1789, resulted in the removal of the royal family to Paris. Versailles was the seat of the French government 1871-79. It is the place of election of French presidents. Population (1901), 54,081.

Versailles (ver-sälz'). The capital of Woodford County, Kentucky, 12 miles southeast of Frankfort. Population (1900), 2,337.

Versailles, Preliminaries of. The preliminaries of peace between France and Germany signed at Versailles Feb. 26, 1871, and ratified by the treaty of Frankfort. See Frankfort.

Versailles, Treaty of. See Paris, Treaties of (b).

Vertentes (vär-tän'tās), Serra dos. A low mountain-chain in Minas Geraes, Brazil, connecting the Goyaz Mountains with the coast system, and separating the head streams of the Paraná from those of the São Francisco and Tocantins.

Vertot d'Aubeuf (ver-tō' dö-béf'), Abbé René Aubert de. Born at Château Benetot, Normandy, Nov. 25, 1655; died at Paris, June 15, 1735. A French historian. He was in a cloister 1677-1701, and became secretary of the Duchess of Orléans in 1703, and historiographer of the Order of Malta in 1715. He wrote "Histoire des révolutions de Portugal" (1689), "Histoire des révolutions de Sardè" (1696), "Histoire des révolutions de la république romaine" (1719), "Histoire des chevaliers de Malte" (1726).

Vertumnus (ver-tum' nus). [L., 'the god of the changing year,' 'he who turns or changes himself.'] An ancient Roman deity who presided over gardens and orchards, and was worshiped as the god of spring or of the seasons in general.

Vertus (ver-tü'). [ML. Virtus.] A town in the department of Marne, France, 18 miles west-southwest of Châlons-sur-Marne; noted for its wines. Population (1891), 2,781.

Verulæ (ver'ū-lē). An ancient town of the Hernici; the modern Veroli.

Verulam, Baron. See Bacon, Francis.

Verulamium (ver-ō-lā'mi-um). An ancient British and Roman town, situated near the site of the present St. Albans, England.

Verus (vé'rus), Lucius. Died 169 A. D. The adopted son of the emperor Antoninus Pius; colleague of the emperor Marcus Aurelius 161-169.

Verus, Marcus Annius. The original name of the emperor Marcus Aurelius.

Vert-vert (vār-vār'). 1. A burlesque poem by Gresset, giving the history of a parrot, the pet of a convent.—2. An opera by Offenbach, words by Meilhac and Nuitter, produced at Paris in 1869.

Verviers (ver-vyā'). A city in the province of Liège, Belgium, situated on the Vesdre 13 miles east by south of Liège. It has manufactures of cloth, etc. Population (1893), commune, 50,423.

Vervins (ver-vañ'). [ML. Verrinum.] A town in the department of Aisne, France, situated on the Vilpion 24 miles northeast of Laon. A treaty between France and Spain was concluded here May 2, 1598; conquests were mutually restored. Population (1891), commune, 3,233.

Very (ver'i), Jones. Born at Salem, Mass., Aug. 28, 1813; died there, May 8, 1880. An American poet and essayist, a graduate of Harvard in 1836. He became a Unitarian minister, but preached only occasionally. His works were edited by J. F. Clarke in 1886.

Very Hard Cash. A novel by Charles Reade, published serially in 1863 as "Hard Cash."

Very Woman, A, or the Prince of Tarent. A comedy printed in 1655 as the work of Massinger. It was probably written by Fletcher and revised by Massinger. It is to be identified with a comedy called "The Woman's Plot," which was acted at court in 1621.

Vesalius (ve-sā'hi-us), Andreas. Born at Brussels, Dec. 31, 1514; died in a shipwreck on the island of Zante, Oct. 15, 1564. A noted Belgian anatomist, physician to the emperor Charles V. and, after his abdication, to Philip II. He lived chiefly at Madrid, and was condemned to death by the Inquisition. His sentence was commuted by the king to a pilgrimage to the Holy Sepulcher. On his return he was shipwrecked. His chief and epoch-making work is "De corporis humani fabrica libri septem."

Vesontio (ve-son'shi-ō). The Roman name of Besançon.

Vesoul (ve-zōl'). The capital of the department of Haute-Saône, France, situated on the Durgeon in lat. 47° 37' N., long. 6° 8' E. Population (1891), commune, 9,770.

Vespasian (ves-pā'zhi-an) (Titus Flavius Sabinus Vespasianus). Born near Reate, Italy, Nov. 17, 9 A. D.; died June 24, 79 A. D. Roman emperor 70-79. He was of humble origin, but rose to distinction in the army, and became consul in 51. He was afterward governor of Africa; and in 67 was appointed commander-in-chief against the insurgent Jews. He was proclaimed emperor in 69. His general Antonius Primus overthrew Vitellius in the same year, and Vespasian arrived at Rome in 70, leaving his son Titus to continue the Jewish war. The chief events of his reign were the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus (70), the victories of Agricola in Britain, and the suppression of the revolted Batavians under Civilis by Petilius Cerealis (70). He restored discipline in the army and order in the finances, and expended large sums on public works, including the Colosseum, which, however, he did not live to finish.

Vespers, Sicilian. See Sicilian Vespers.

Vespucci (ves-pō'ehē), Amerigo, Latinized Americus Vesputius. Born at Florence, March 18, 1452; died at Seville, Feb. 22, 1512.

An Italian navigator. He was the son of Nastagio Vespucci, a notary of Florence; received his education from his uncle, a Dominican friar; and became a clerk in the commercial house of the Medicis. He was sent to Spain by his employers about 1490; and some years after appears to have entered the service of the commercial house of Juonato Berardi at Seville, of which he became a member in 1495. This house fitted out Columbus's second expedition (1493), and it has been suggested that Vespucci may have accompanied Columbus's first or second expedition, although the supposition is unsupported by any proof. Vespucci himself claims to have accompanied four expeditions to the New World, of each of which he wrote a narrative. Two of these sailed from Spain by order of Ferdinand in May, 1497, and May, 1499, respectively; the other two were despatched from Portugal by Emanuel in May, 1501, and June, 1503. The first expedition, in which he would appear to have held the post of astronomer, left Cadiz May 10 or 20, 1497, and after touching at the Canaries came "at the end of twenty-seven days upon a coast which we thought to be that of a continent." If this expedition is authentic, Vespucci reached the continent of America a week or two earlier than the Cabots and about fourteen months earlier than Columbus. His account of these expeditions was contained in a diary said to have been written after his fourth voyage, and entitled "Le Quatre Giornale," no portion of which is extant. He also wrote several letters to his former schoolfellow Soderini, gonfalonier of Florence, one of which remains in a Latin translation printed at St. Dié in 1507. Waldseemüller (Hylacomylus), who made use of this letter in his "Cosmographie Introductio," published at St. Dié in the same year, was the first to suggest the name America for the new continent, in honor of its supposed discoverer, Amerigo Vespucci.

It should first of all be noted that the sole authority for a voyage made by Vespucci in 1497 is Vespucci himself. All contemporary history, other than his own letters, is absolutely silent in regard to such a voyage, whether it be history in printed books, or in the archives of those kingdoms of Europe where the precious documents touching the earlier expeditions to the New World were deposited. . . . The fact is unquestioned that Vespucci, who had been a resident of Spain for some time, became in 1495 a member of the commercial house of Juonato Berardi at Seville, and that in January of the next year, as the public accounts show, he was paid a sum of money relative to a contract with Government which Berardi did not live to complete. The presumption is that he would not soon absent himself from his post of duty, where new and onerous responsibilities had been imposed upon him by the recent death of the senior partner of the house with which he was connected. But at any rate he is found there in the spring of 1497, Muñoz having ascertained that fact from the official records of expenses incurred in fitting out the ships for western expeditions, still preserved at Seville. Those records show that from the middle of April, 1497, to the end of May, 1498, Vespucci was busily engaged at Seville and San Lucar in the equipment of the fleet with which Columbus sailed on his third voyage. The alibi, therefore, is complete. Vespucci could not have been absent from Spain from May, 1497, to Oct., 1498, the period of his alleged voyage. S. H. Gay, in Winsor's Narrative and Critical History [of America, II, 137, 142.]

Vesta (ves'tā). [L., = Gr. Ἑστία, the goddess of the hearth.] One of the chief divinities of the ancient Romans, equivalent to the Greek Hestia. She was one of the 12 great Olympians, the virgin goddess of the hearth, presiding over both the private family altar and the central altar of the city, the tribe, or the race. She was worshiped along with the Penates at every meal, when the family assembled round the altar or hearth, which was in the center of the house. Aeneas was said to have carried the sacred fire (which was her symbol) from Troy, and to have brought it to Italy, and it was preserved at Rome by the state in the sanctuary of the goddess which stood in the Forum. The fire was watched by six stainless virgins, called vestales, who prevented it from becoming extinguished. The Roman temples of Vesta were circular, preserving the form of the primitive huts of the Latin race, because it was in such a hut that the sacred fire was first tended by the young girls while their parents and brothers were absent in the chase or pasture-ground.

The very fact that the Vesta worship is the most indubitable of the correspondences between the Greek and Roman mythologies is itself a proof of the rudimentary nature of their common civilisation. Only among the rudest of existing savage tribes, such as the Australians, is it held a duty to keep alight the fire of the tribe, which if extinguished has to be obtained from some neighbouring tribe, as they are ignorant of the means of rekindling it. The Chippeways and Natchez Indians had an institution for keeping alight the tribal fire, certain persons being set aside and devoted to this occupation; and the incorporation and endowment of the Vestal Virgins at Rome seems to be a survival of a similar practice, the social duty, originally devolving on the daughters of the house, obtaining a religious sanction as the service of the perpetual flame. Taylor, Aryans, p. 313.

Vesta. An asteroid (No. 4) discovered by Olbers at Bremen, March 29, 1807.

Vesta, Temple of. See Tiroli.

Vestini (ves-ti'ni). In ancient history, a people of central Italy, living east of the Sabines; probably of Sabine affinities. They became allied with the Romans about 300 B. C., and joined the Marsi in the Social War.

Vestris, Madame. See Mathews, Lucia Elizabeth.

Vesulus (ves'ū-lus). The ancient name of Monte Viso.

Vesunna (ve-sun'ā). The ancient name of Périgueux.

Vesuvius (ve-sū'vi-us), Mount. [L. Vesuvius, It. Vesuvio, F. Vésuve, G. Vesuv.] The only active volcano on the continent of Europe, and the most noted one in the world, situated on the Bay of Naples, Italy, 9 miles east-southeast of Naples. It has two summits—the volcano proper (about 4,200 feet high), and Monte Somma to the north (3,730 feet). It is now reached by a wire-rope railway. It was regarded in ancient times as extinct. Severe earthquake shocks occurred in 63 A. D., and the first recorded eruption in 79, destroying Pompeii, Herculaneum, and Stabie. The most destructive eruption since that time happened Dec. 16, 1631. Others, more or less notable, took place in 203, 472, 512, 685, 1139, 1631, 1707, 1779, 1794, 1822, 1855, and 1872.

Vesuvius, Battle of. A victory gained near Mount Vesuvius, about 340 B. C., by the Romans under Manlius Torquatus and Decimus Mus over the Latin League.

Veszprém (ves'präm), or Veszprim (ves'prim), G. Weissbrunn (vis'brön). The capital of the county of Veszprém, Hungary, 63 miles west-southwest of Budapest; the seat of a Roman Catholic bishopric. It has a trade in wine and grain. It was captured by Maximilian in 1490; by the Hungarians in 1491; by the Germans in 1527; by the Turks in 1532; by the Germans in 1566; by the grand vizir Sinan in 1594; by the Imperialists in 1598; and by the Turks again in 1605, who finally lost it in 1683. Population (1890), 12,655.

Veta Madre (vā'tā mā'drā). [Sp., 'mother lode,' i. e. chief lode.] A celebrated silver lode, or system of lodes, near Guanajuato, Mexico. It is about 8 miles long. It was discovered in 1558, and Humboldt calculated that, up to 1800, it had yielded one fifth of the silver then current in the world. It has been worked to a great depth, and most of the shafts are now abandoned owing to the lack of drainage-machinery of sufficient power.

Vetancurt (vā-tän-kört'), Agustin de. Born at Mexico City, 1620; died there, 1700. A Mexican Franciscan author. His most important work is "Teatro Mexicano" (4 parts in 2 vols., 1697-98), an ethnographical and historical account of New Spain. He published many other books, including biographies, theological treatises, and a grammar of the Nahuatl language. Also written Vetancur, Vetancour, etc.

Veterani Cave (ve-te-rā'nē kāv). A large cavern on the left bank of the Danube, in southern Hungary, about 12 miles from Old Orsova. It was defended for 45 days against an overwhelming Turkish force in 1691 by Baron von Arnau, at the command of Count Veterani (whence its name).

Via Emilia (vi'ā ē-mil'i-ā). [L., 'Emilian Way.' See the def.] An important ancient Roman highway, the earliest in northern Italy, connecting Placentia (Piacenza) and Ariminum (Rimini), where it met the Flaminian Way. Later branches extended from Rimini to Bologna, and thence to Aquileia, and from Piacenza to Pavia, and the main road was extended from Piacenza to Milan and Aosta. The original highway was built by M. Emilius Lepidus in 187 B. C., and is still in use.

Via Appia. See Appian Way.

Via Aurelia (ā-rē-lī-ā). [L., 'Aurelian Way'] One of the chief ancient Roman highways. It was built toward the close of the republic, exactly when is unknown, and extended from Rome, for the most part along the coast, to Pisa, whence it was continued along the Ligurian shore to the Maritime Alps, and by Augustus was carried into Gaul. There are considerable remains of the road, notably along the Italian and French Riviera.

Via Cassia (kash'i-ā). [L., 'Cassian Way.'] An ancient Roman highway which extended from Rome through Etruria to Arretium (Arezzo), and thence to Florence and Luca. It was in existence before the end of the republic, but the time of its construction is unknown.

Via Clodia (klō'di-ā). [L., 'Clodian Way.'] An ancient Roman highway of the time of the republic, extending though Etruria on a line about parallel with the Via Cassia. It was a branch of the Via Cassia, which left about 10 miles from Rome, where its pavement still exists, and appears to have ended at Saturnia, passing through Bracciano and Bieda.

Via Dolorosa (vi'ā dol-ō-rō'si-ā). [L., 'Dolorous Way.'] A name given by Christians to the road from the Mount of Olives to Golgotha.

Via Egnatia (eg-nā'shi-ā). An important ancient Roman military road, running from the coast of the Adriatic at Dyrrachium (Durazzo) through Illyria and Macedonia to Thessalonica, and thence by Philippi through Thraee to Cypselia (modern Ipsala). The date of its construction is unknown. Its length was 634 Roman miles. There are abundant remains of the road, especially near Salonica.

Via Flaminia. See Flaminian Way.

Via Latina (la-ti-ni-ā). [L., 'Latin Way.'] One of the great highways leaving ancient Rome. It ran to Casilinum (near Capua), where it united with the Appian Way. A branch was later carried from Teanum to Beneventum. Both the Via Latina and the Appian Way left Rome by the Porta Capena. The Via Latina undoubtedly existed as a road for a long period before it was regularly constructed and paved. The invading forces of both Pyrrhus and Hannibal followed its course. There are extensive remains, not only of the paved way, but of the bordering towns and monuments.

Via Mala (vō'ā mā'lā). A picturesque portion of the road leading up the valley of the Hinter Rhein, immediately south of Tusi, canton of Grisons, Switzerland. It traverses a deep and narrow chasm.

Via Salaria (vi'ā sa-lā-ri-ā). One of the most celebrated of ancient Roman highways. It ran from Rome up the Tiber valley to Rente (Rieti), then crossed the Apennines and descended the valley of the Tronto, past Ascoli, to Castrum Truentinum on the Adriatic. Here it branched, one road running north to Ancona and the other south to Adria. The date of this highway is unknown; it is undoubtedly very old, and existed as a route long before it was built as a public work.

Viatka. See Vyatka.

Viau (vyō), Théophile de. Born near Agon, France, 1590; died at Paris, 1626. A French poet. He wrote the tragedy "Pyrame et Thisbé" (1617), and for his part in the authorship of "Parissime Satirique" (1622) was condemned to death. His sentence was commuted to banishment. His complete works were published in 1850.

Viaud (vyō), Louis Marie Julien: pseudonym

Pierre Loti. Born at Rochefort, Charente-Inférieure, Jan. 14, 1850. A French novelist. He was admitted to the French training-ship Borda in 1867, traveled extensively, and took part in several campaigns. His comrades nicknamed him Loti after an Indian flower. His novels are largely exotic in their subject-matter, and reveal forcibly the author's keen poetic instinct and idealism. Loti's works include "Aziyadé" (1879), "Karahu: idylle polynésienne," the reprint of which was entitled "Le mariage de Loti" (1880), "Le roman d'un Spahi" (1881), "Fleurs d'ennuï," "Pasquala Ivanovitch," "Suleïma" (1882), "Mon frère Yves" (1883), "Les trois dames de la Kasbah" (1884), "Pêcheur d'Islande" (1886), "Madame Chrysanthème," "Propos d'exil" (1887), "Japoneries d'automne" (1889). Of late years he has also written "An Maroc," "Le roman d'un enfant," and "Le livre de la piticé et de la mort"; and his most recent publications are "Fantôme d'Orient" (1892) and "Mantelot" (1893). In 1891 he was elected by the French Academy to fill the seat left vacant by the death of Octave Feuillet.

Via Valeria (vi'ā va-lē-ri-ā). [L., 'Valerian Way.'] One of the principal highways of ancient Rome. It continued the Via Tiburtina, which led from Rome to Tibur (Tivoli); to Lake Fucinus and the Marsic territory, and was afterward extended to the Adriatic at the mouth of the Aternus. The time of its construction as far as Cerentia, near modern Coll' Armeno, on Lake Fucinus, is unknown; its continuation through the Apennines at Mons Imeus, and in the Aternus valley, was built by Claudius. Many portions of the roadway survive, with the ancient mile-stones and other remains.

Victory of Samothrace. One of the greatest art monuments of antiquity, found in Samothrace in 1863, and now in the Louvre, Paris. The colossal winged figure (of which the head has been lost) stands, with full drapery blown by the wind, on the prow of a trireme. The work is of Hellenistic date.

Vicuña Mackenna (vĕ-kōn'yā māk-kā'nā), Benjamin. Born at Santiago, Aug. 25, 1831; died on his estate of Santa Rosa de Colmo, Jan. 25, 1886. A Chilean historian. He was engaged in the revolts of 1851, and was obliged to leave the country, traveling in the United States and Europe until 1856, when he was allowed to return. He engaged in journalism, but was again banished 1858-63; was elected to Congress 1864; and was special envoy to Peru and the United States 1865-67. In 1875 he was the candidate of the liberal party for the presidency. His works, which are numerous, relate mainly to the history of Chile; they are written in popular style, but are generally very accurate. Among the best-known are "El Ostracismo de los Carreras" (1857), "Historia de la revolucion del Perú" (1860), "El Ostracismo del general O'Higgins" (1860), "Historia de la administracion Montt" (1862), "Historia de Chile" (1868), and "Campañas de Arica y Tacna" (1880).

Vida (vĕ'dā), Marco Girolamo. Born at Cremona, Italy, about 1480; died Sept. 27, 1566. An Italian Latin poet. He was made by Leo X. prior in Frascati, and by Clement VII. in 1532 bishop of Alba. His Latin poems include the religious epic "Christias" (in 6 books, 1535), "De arte poetica" (1537), "De bombyce" (1527; on silk-culture), "De Indo scacchorum" (1527; on chess), etc.

Vidal (vĕ-dāl'), Pierre. Born at Toulouse; flourished about 1175-1215. A Provençal troubadour. He accompanied Richard the Lion-hearted to Cyprus in 1190.

Pierre Vidal of Toulouse, a troubadour who followed King Richard to the third Crusade, was no less celebrated for his extravagant actions than for his poetical talents. Love and vanity, amongst the poets, seem by turns to assume such an empire over the feelings as almost to shake the reason. None, however, have been known to display more perfect madness than Pierre Vidal. Persuaded that he was beloved by every lady, and that he was the bravest of all knights, he was the Quixote of poetry. His ridiculous amours, and his extravagant rhodomontades, heightened by the treacherous pleasantness of pretended friends, led him into the strangest errors. During the Crusade he was persuaded at Cyprus to marry a Greek lady who asserted that she was allied to one of the families which had filled the throne of Constantinople; and this circumstance furnished him with sufficient grounds for believing that he was himself entitled to the purple.

Sismond's, Lit. of South of Europe, I. 136.

Vidar (vê'dâr). In Norse mythology, a powerful god, son of Odin and the giantess Grid.

Vidaurri (vê-THOUR'rê), Santiago. Born in Mexico about 1803; executed in the city of Mexico, July 8, 1867. A Mexican general and politician. He was a member of the government of Maximilian, and was condemned as a traitor.

Vidocq (vê-dok'), François Eugène. Born at Arras, France, July 23, 1775; died at Paris, May, 1857. A French detective and adventurer. In early life he was a soldier and thief; was several times imprisoned; became connected with the Paris police as a detective in 1809; and resigned as chief of the detective force in 1825. In 1832 he started a private detective establishment, soon closed by the government. He was the reputed author of "Mémoires" and other works.

Viehoff (vê'hof), Heinrich. Born at Büttgen, near Neuss, April 28, 1804; died at Treves, April 28, 1886. A German historian of literature and translator.

Vieira (vê-â'râ), Antonio. Born at Lisbon, Feb. 6, 1608; died at Bahia, Brazil, July 18, 1697. A celebrated Portuguese missionary, pulpit orator, author, and publicist. He was taken to Bahia when a child; entered the Jesuit order there in 1625; became celebrated as a pulpit orator, and in 1641 returned to Portugal with the ex-governor of Brazil, Mascarenhas. There he attracted crowds to his sermons; was nominated royal preacher in 1644; was an influential counselor of the king; and was sent on important diplomatic missions to Paris, The Hague, and Rome. In 1652 he was ordered to the missions of Maranhão; returned to Lisbon for a short time to secure protection for the Indians in 1654; was again in Maranhão 1655 to 1661, when there was an uprising against the missionaries; and was sent a prisoner to Portugal. There his eloquence prevailed with the court, and a new governor was sent to Maranhão with orders to protect the Jesuits. Vieira remained in Portugal, but fell into ill favor with the court; and for a book which he published, "Esperanças de Portugal," was tried before the Inquisition, imprisoned 1665-67, and forbidden to preach, but was soon reinstated. In 1670-75 he was in Rome, where his brilliant oratory brought him renewed fame. He returned to Brazil in 1681, and was provincial of his order there from 1688. Vieira's published works consist mainly of sermons and letters, the latter often of much historical value. He is one of the first, if not the greatest, of the Portuguese prose authors.

Vieira, João Fernandes. See Fernandes Vieira.

Vienna (vi-en'ä). The Roman name of the city of Vienna in France.

Vienna. [G. Wien, F. Vienne, L. Vindobona.]

The capital of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy, of the Cisleithan division of the empire, and of Lower Austria, and the residence of the emperor. It is situated on the Danube Canal (southern arm of the Danube) and the Wien, in lat. 48° 13' N., long. 16° 23' E., and comprises the Inner City (surrounded by the magnificent Ringstrasse) and the municipal districts Leopoldstadt, Landstrasse, Wieden, Margarethen, Mariahilf, Neuba, Josefstadt, Alsergrund, Favoriten, Simmering, Meidling, Hietzing, Rudolfsheim, Fünfhaus, Ottakring, Hernals, Währing, and Döbling. St. Stephen's cathedral (12th-15th century) is one of the finest specimens of Gothic architecture in Europe. Among other churches the Karlskirche and the modern Votivkirche are the most remarkable. Other imposing edifices are the new Rathaus, the Parliament and University buildings, and the imperial museums. The principal pleasure resort is the Prater (which see). Vienna is the chief commercial and industrial center of the country; has extensive commerce by railway and the Danube in grain, manufactured goods, etc.; and has manufactures of leather, silk, cotton, iron and wooden wares, beer, fancy goods, etc. It was an ancient Celtic settlement; was fortified by the Romans; was probably the place of the death of Marcus Aurelius; was taken by the Huns, and later by the Avars; and was conquered by Charles the Great. The Babenbergers were established there from the 10th century. Vienna has been the capital of the Hapsburg dominions from 1282; was occupied by the French in 1805 and in 1809; and was a scene of revolutionary outbreaks in 1848. A world's exposition was held there in 1873. Population (1900), 1,602,269.

After the death of Michelangelo he succeeded him as the architect of St. Peter's, Rome, and also designed the Escorial in Spain. He lived for several years in France, where he executed a number of bronzes.

Vigny (vên-yê'), Alfred Victor, Comte de. Born at Loches, Touraine, March 27, 1799; died at Paris, Sept. 17, 1863. A French poet and novelist. At the age of 16 he entered the army, and was promoted captain in 1823. During the moments of enforced inactivity in his military career he pursued his studies; as early as 1815 he composed a couple of essays, "La Dryade" and "Syméta." His first collection of poems appeared in 1822 as "Poèmes antiques et modernes." That same year he published "Le Trappiste," and "Eloa, ou la sœur des anges" in 1824. Then came his last work of a biblical character, "Le Déluge," and his first work in the new romantic ordering, "Dolorida." He published his great historical novel "Cinq-Mars" in 1826, and resigned from the army in 1828 by reason of ill health. As a dramatist he translated Shakspere's "Othello" and "Merchant of Venice" into French verse, wrote an original historical drama, "La maréchale d'Ancre," and finally produced his best piece of work in this line, "Chatterton" (1835). This drama is related in its subject to "Stello, ou les diables bleus" (1832), in which De Vigny defined the position of a poet in modern society. Another work, in which a warrior's position is similarly defined, appeared as "Servitude et grandeur militaires" (1835). Among the last publications during the author's lifetime was a series of "Poèmes philosophiques" (1843). He spent the last twenty years of his life in retirement, and left several posthumous works. He was admitted to the French Academy May 8, 1845.

Villegaignon (vīl-gā-nyōn'), Chevalier de (Nicolas Durand). Born in 1510; died near Nemours, Jan. 9, 1571. A French soldier. He served against the Turks and Algerians; was vice-admiral of Brittany; and in 1555 was given command of the expedition sent by Coligny to found a colony in Brazil. He sailed from Havre, July 12, with two ships, and in Nov. entered the Bay of Rio de Janeiro and occupied the island which is still known by his name, establishing friendly relations with the Indians. Coligny had intended the colony as a refuge for Protestants, but it was made up of different sects, including Catholics; quarrels arose, and Villegaignon, whose affiliations were doubtful, expelled the Calvinists. In 1559 he went to France, ostensibly for reinforcements, but never returned, and the colony was destroyed by the Portuguese in 1567 (see Sa, Mem de). Villegaignon published (in Latin) works on the wars in which he had been engaged, etc. Also written Villegaignon.

Villegaignon (vīl-gā-nyōn'), Ilha de. A small island in the harbor of Rio de Janeiro, fronting the city. It was occupied by the French who formed the first settlement on the bay. (See Chevalier de Villegaignon, above.) During the empire it was fortified, and it was a strongly contested point during the naval rebellion of 1893-94.

Villehardouin (vīl-ir-dō-ān'), Geoffroi de. Born presumably on his ancestral estates near Troyes, Champagne, between 1150 and 1163; died probably in 1212. A French chronicler. The only thing known concerning him before the time of the fourth Crusade (1202) is that he bore the title of marshal of Champagne in 1191. When his liege lord Thibaut III. joined the Crusade preached in 1199, Villehardouin took service under him, and gained special reputation in negotiating with the Venetians for the transfer of the Crusaders by sea to the Holy Land. He followed the Crusade through all its disasters, and chronicled all the events of importance that extended over a period of 10 years (1198-1207). His "Chronique" is considered trustworthy from a historical point of view, but is more deserving still for its literary excellence, while being one of the oldest monuments in original French prose. The best edition of this "Chronique" was made by M. Natalis de Wailly under the title "La conquête de Constantinople, par Geoffroi de Villehardouin, texte original accompagné d'une traduction" (Paris, 1872).

Villela Barboza (vīl-lā-lā bār-bō'zā), Francisco, Marquis of Paranaguá from 1825. Born at Rio de Janeiro, Nov. 20, 1769; died there, Sept. 11, 1846. A Brazilian politician of the conservative party. He was deputy to the Portuguese Cortes 1821-22, and during the reign of Pedro I. was repeatedly a member of the cabinet. The unpopular acts of the emperor, which led to his enforced abdication in 1831, were due to Barboza's advice. He was a poet of some repute.

Villèle (vīl-āl'), Comte Jean Baptiste Séraphin Joseph de. Born at Toulouse, France, Aug. 14, 1773; died there, March 13, 1854. A French statesman and financier. He served in early life in the navy; after the restoration was a leader of the ultra-royalists; entered the cabinet in 1820; became minister of finance in 1821; and was premier 1822-28.

Villemain (vīl-mān'), Abel François. Born at Paris, June 11, 1790; died there, May 8, 1870. A French writer. On graduating from the Lycée Louis-le-Grand, he studied law. In 1810 he was called to this chair of rhetoric at the Lycée Charlemagne, and from 1816 to 1826 filled the chair in French eloquence at the Sorbonne. His success as a teacher was such that his name was associated with those of Cousin and Guizot, thus forming the famous trio known as "les trois professeurs." He won his first laurels as a writer in successful competition before the French Academy for the prize offered for the best essay entitled "Eloge de Montaigne" (1812). He again took the prize in 1814 with his "Avantages et inconvénients de la critique," and in 1816 with his "Eloge de Montesquieu." The French Academy elected him a member in 1821. The success of his "Histoire de Cromwell" (1819) led him gradually into a political life, so that after 1836 he gave up teaching altogether. From 1839 to 1844 he was almost continuously minister of public instruction. Besides a couple of essays on Grecian themes, entitled "Lascaris, ou les Grecs du XVe siècle" and "Essai sur l'état des Grecs depuis la conquête musulmane" (1825), Villemain wrote several shorter papers and articles that were ultimately published in book form: prominent among these writings stand his "Souvenirs contemporains d'histoire et de littérature" (1856). His reputation, however, rests more particularly on the following three great works: "Cours de littérature française, tableau du XVIIIe siècle," "Tableau de l'éloquence chrétienne au IVe siècle," and, in a somewhat lesser degree, "Histoire de Grégoire VII."—this last-named being a posthumous publication (1873).

Villiers de L'Isle-Adam (vê-yâ' dê îl-ä-dou'), Philippe de. Born at Beauvais, France, in 1464; died in Malta in 1534. Grand master of the order of St. John of Jerusalem. He was elected grand master in 1521. In 1522, after a six months' siege, he was compelled to surrender the island of Rhodes, the seat of the order, to Solyman. In 1530 he secured from Charles V. the cession of the Islands of Malta and Gozo, which became the new seat of the order.

Villon (vêl-lôn'), François. Born at Paris, 1431; died about 1484. One of the earliest French poets. Little is known of his life except what may be gathered from his own writings. Although of very humble extraction, he found means to acquire a good education. Beginning with his student days, he led throughout his whole life a wild Bohemian existence. Three times he appeared before the courts to answer serious charges (see the extract). The first time he was sentenced to be flogged. Between his first and second arrests he wrote "Le petit testament" (1456). For his second offense he was condemned to death: he owed his life, it is said, to one of the princesses of the royal household, to whom he had inscribed a poem, "Le dit de la naissance Marie." She was presumably the daughter of the duke Charles of Orléans, himself a poet, who raised Villon to an honorable position. In 1461 he again was imprisoned. On regaining his liberty he composed his masterpiece, "Le grand testament," in which he incorporated a large number of his older ballads. Besides the works already named, Villon wrote several separate poems and a series of obscure slang rimes, "Le jargon."

François Villon, or Corbueil, or Corbier, or de Montcorbier, or des Loges, was certainly born at Paris in the year 1431. Of the date of his death nothing certain is known, some authorities extending his life towards the close of the century in order to adjust Rabelais' anecdotes of him, others supposing him to have died before the publication of the first edition of his works in 1489. That Villon was not his patronymic, whichsoever of his numerous aliases may really deserve that distinction, is certain. He was a citizen of Paris and a member of the university, having the status of cleric. But his youth was occupied in other matters than study. In 1455 he killed, apparently in self-defence, a priest named Philip Serenoise, fled from Paris, was condemned to banishment in default of appearance, and six months afterwards received letters of pardon. In 1456 a faithless mistress, Catherine de Vauselles, drew him into a second fray, in which he had the worst, and again he fled from Paris. During his absence a burglary committed in the capital put the police on the track of a gang of young good-for-nothings among whom Villon's name figured, and he was arrested, tried, tortured, and condemned to death. On appeal, however, the sentence was commuted to banishment. Four years after he was in prison at Meung, consigned thither by the Bishop of Orléans; but the king, Louis the Eleventh, set him free. Thereforward nothing certain is known of him.

Vinci (vin'ehô), Leonardo (or Lionardo) da. Born at Vinci, near Empoli, Italy, 1452; died at Cloux, near Amboise, France, May 2, 1519.

A famous Italian painter, architect, sculptor, scientist, engineer, mechanician, and musician. He was taken by his father to Verocchio about 1470, with whom he remained until he was past twenty, drawing, modeling, designing for architecture, and planning engineering schemes. His studio companions were Lorenzo di Credi and Pergino. He was in the Company of Painters in 1472, and received his first recorded commission in 1478. He seems to have gone to Milan about 1485, having prospered little at Florence. He returned to Florence in 1503; went to Milan again in 1506; and lived in Rome 1514-1515. He painted his famous Cenacolo, or Last Supper, on the wall of the refectory in the Convent of Santa Maria delle Grazie; it was finished in 1498. Owing to the dampness of the wall, it has been frequently repainted: the original sketches, however, still exist, and from a copy of it by Marco d'Oggione Raphael Morghen produced his celebrated engraving published in 1800. While living in Milan under the protection of Ludovico il Moro, he occupied himself with the colossal equestrian statue of Duke Francesco I., the model of which was exhibited in 1493 and demolished by the French in 1499. On his return to Florence he drew the cartoon from which Filippo painted the altarpiece of the monks of Seryl. His principal work subsequently seems to have been in portraiture, and he did many portraits of women; the best-known is the "Mona Lisa" in the Louvre, Paris, completed about 1504. He was also commissioned to paint a wall of the council-hall at Florence, for which he made a cartoon corresponding to the great cartoon of Michelangelo. Both are now lost. He went to France in 1516, at the invitation of Francis I., and died there at the Chateau de Cloux. Among his works are "La belle Ferronnière," "The Virgin of the Rocks" (National Gallery, London, and another version at the Louvre), "St. John the Baptist" (Louvre), "St. Anne" (Louvre), and a cartoon of St. Anne in the Royal Academy, London.

He wrote a celebrated treatise on painting, "Trattato della pittura," published in 1651. A portrait of him, by himself, is in the Royal Library, Turin.

Virgin, The. See Madonna.

Virginia (vēr-jin'i-ä). [L., fem. of Virginus.]

In Roman legend, the daughter of Virginus, a plebeian, who was slain by her father to keep her from the power of the decemvir Appius Claudius (449 B. C.). This act led to the overthrow of the decemvirate.

Virginia. A tragedy by Alfieri, printed in 1783. See Appius and Virginia.

Virginia. An asteroid (No. 50) discovered by Ferguson at Washington, Oct. 4, 1857.

Virginia. [Named from Queen Elizabeth, the "Virgin Queen."] One of the South Atlantic States of the United States of America, extending from lat. 36° 31' to 39° 27' N., and from long. 75° 13' to 83° 37' W. Capital, Richmond. It is bounded by West Virginia on the north and northwest, Maryland and the District of Columbia (separated by the Potomac) on the north and northeast, Chesapeake Bay and the Atlantic Ocean on the east, North Carolina and Tennessee on the south, and Kentucky on the west, and contains a small detached portion east of Chesapeake Bay. It is called the "Old Dominion" and the "Mother of Presidents." It is level in the southeast and mountainous in the northwest and west, and is traversed from northeast to southwest by the Blue Ridge and other ranges of the Appalachians (highest point, about 5,700 feet). It is sometimes divided into the physical regions Tidewater, Midland, Piedmont, Blue Ridge valley, and Appalachia. The principal river-systems are those of the Potomac (with the Shenandoah), Rappahannock, York, James, Roanoke, and Tennessee. Virginia is rich in agricultural and mineral resources; is the second State in the Union in the production of tobacco, and has also a large production of wheat, corn, vegetables, fruit, timber, coal, iron, salt, and building-stone; has iron, coke, tobacco, leather, and other manufactures; and has various mineral springs and natural curiosities (as the Natural Bridge, Luray Caverns, etc.). It has 100 counties, sends 2 senators and 10 representatives to Congress, and has 12 electoral votes. It was the first of the original colonies, and one of the 13 original States, and was settled by the English at Jamestown in 1607. Among the early leaders were John Smith, Newport, Somers, Gates, and Delawarr. It was governed at first by the London Company. Negro slavery was introduced in 1619. It became a royal colony in 1624; was the scene of Bacon's rebellion in 1676; took part in the French and Indian war; took a prominent part in the events leading to the Revolution; ceded its territory beyond the Ohio in 1784; ratified the Constitution in 1788; was the leading State in influence in the early history of the country, furnishing four of the first five Presidents; seceded from the Union April 17, 1861; became the center of the Confederate States, and contained their capital; and was one of the chief seats of the war. Among the events of which it was the scene were the battle of Bull Run, Peninsular and Valley campaigns, second Bull Run campaign, Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville campaigns, Wilderness campaign, siege and capture of Richmond, and surrender of Lee's army. The State was readmitted to the Union in 1870. Area, 42,450 square miles. Population (1900), 1,854,184.

Virginia, Army of. A Federal army in the Civil War, formed in Aug., 1862, out of the commands of Frémont, Banks, and McDowell. It was commanded by General Pope, and took part in the second Bull Run campaign, after which it was discontinued.

Virginia, University of. An institution of learning situated near Charlottesville, Virginia; chartered 1819. Its chief founder was Thomas Jefferson.

Virginia City (vēr-jin'i-ä sit'i). The capital of Madison County, Montana, situated on Alder Creek 60 miles southeast of Butte. It is a gold-mining center. Population (1900), 2,695.

Virginia City, or Virginia. The capital of Storey County, Nevada, situated on the slope of Mount Davidson, about 6,200 feet above sea-level, in lat. 39° 17' N. It is the second largest incorporated place in the State, and one of the richest mining centers in the world. It was built in 1859 over the Comstock Lode. Population (1900), 2,695.

Virginians (vēr-jin'i-anz). The. A novel by Thackeray, published in 1857-59. The scene is laid in Virginia in the 18th century. It is a sequel to "Henry Esmond."

Virginia Plan, The. An outline plan of a constitution for the United States, presented to the Constitutional Convention of 1787 by Edmund Randolph of Virginia. It projected a national union differing radically from the old confederacy.

Virginia Resolutions, The. Resolutions prepared by James Madison, and passed by the Virginia legislature Dec., 1798, which declared the Alien and Sedition acts "palpable and alarming infractions of the Constitution."

Virgin (vēr-jin) Islands. A group of islands in the West Indies, east of Porto Rico. It comprises the British islands Tortola, Anegada, Virgin Gorda, etc. (forming part of the Leeward Islands Colony); the islands Culebra, Vieques, etc. (dependencies of Porto Rico); and the islands St. Croix, St. Thomas, and St. John. They were discovered by Columbus in Nov., 1493. Total area, about 275 square miles. Population (1891), about 55,000.

Virginus (vēr-jin'i-us). In Roman legendary history, the father of Virginia. See Virginia.

Virginus. A tragedy by J. Sheridan Knowles, produced in 1820.

Virginus. An American vessel captured by the Spaniards in 1873 while engaged in filibustering. The captain and others were executed at Santiago de Cuba. The affair caused extreme tension between the American and Spanish governments. It ended in the payment of an indemnity by Spain.

Virgin Martyr, The. A tragedy by Massinger and Dekker, licensed in 1620, printed in 1622. It was revised in 1668 and 1715.

Virgin of the Rosary, The. A painting by Murillo, in the Royal Museum at Madrid. It is one of the best of Murillo's pictures. The heads of the Virgin and Child show typical Andalusian faces.

Virgin Queen. A name given to Queen Elizabeth of England.

Virgo (vēr'gō). [L., 'the virgin.'] An ancient constellation and sign of the zodiac. The figure represents a winged woman in a robe holding a spike of grain in her left hand. One of the stars was called Vindemiatrix, or by the Greeks Protrygeter—that is, precursor of the vintage. At the time when the zodiac seems to have been formed (2100 B. C.) this star would first be seen at Babylon before sunrise about Aug. 20, or, since there is some evidence that it was then brighter than it is now, perhaps a week earlier. This would seem too late for the vintage, so that perhaps this tradition is older than the zodiac. Virgo appears in the Egyptian zodiacs without wings, yet there seems no room to doubt that the figure was first meant for the winged Assyrian Astarte, especially as the sixth month in the Akkadian is called the "Errand of Ishtar." The symbol of the zodiacal sign is ♍, where a resemblance to a wing may be seen. The constellation contains the white first-magnitude star Spica.

Viriathus (vi-rī'a-thus), or Viriatus (vi-rī'a-tus). Assassinated about 139 B. C. A Lusitanian shepherd who conducted a long and generally successful war against the Romans in the western part of the Spanish peninsula 149-139.

Viroconium. See Viroconium.

Virues (vēr-rō-es'), Cristóval de. Born at Valencia, Spain, about 1550; died about 1610. A Spanish epic and dramatic poet, a friend of Lope de Vega. Five of his plays are extant.

He claims to have first divided Spanish dramas into three jornadas or acts, and Lope de Vega assents to the claim; but they were both mistaken, for we now know that such a division was made by Francisco de Avendaño not later than 1553, when Virues was but three years old. Ticknor, Span. Lit., II. 64.

Viscaino, Sebastian. See Viscaino.

Vischer (fish'er), Friedrich Theodor. Born at Ludwigsburg, Württemberg, June 30, 1807; died at Gmunden, Sept. 14, 1887. A German critic, professor at Tübingen. He was a member of the Frankfurt Parliament of 1848. His chief work is "Ästhetik" (1847-58). His other works include "Über das Erhabene und Komische" (1837), "Kritische Gänge" (1844), etc.

Visconti (vis-kon'tē), Ennio Quirino. [From L. Viccocomites, viscount.] Born at Rome, Nov. 1, 1751; died Feb. 7, 1818. A celebrated Italian archaeologist. He was conservator of the Capitoline Museum at Rome, and member of the provisional government at Rome. In 1799 he went to Paris, where in 1799 he was made custodian of the collections in the Louvre and professor of archaeology. His chief work is "Iconographie grecque" (1808). His other works include the first volume of the "Iconographie romaine" (1817; completed by Mongez), "Museo Pio-Clementino" (1782-87), "Description des antiques du musée royal," etc.

Visconti, Filippo Maria. Died 1447. The last Duke of Milan of the Visconti house, son of G. G. Visconti.

Visconti, Gian Galeazzo. Died 1402. Grand-nephew of Giovanni Visconti, and son of Galeazzo Visconti. He became duke of Milan in 1395; subdued a large part of northern and central Italy; and was a patron of literature and art.

Visconti, Giovanni. Died 1354. Lord of Milan. He annexed Genoa. His dominions were divided among his three nephews.

Visconti-Venosta (vis-kon'tē-vā-nōs'tä). Marquis Emilio. Born at Milan, Jan. 22, 1829. An Italian diplomatist and politician, minister of foreign affairs 1863-64, 1866-67, and 1869-76.

Vishnu (vish'nō). [Skt., 'The Worker'; from vish, work, be active, accomplish.] In later Hindu mythology, the second member of the trimurti or triad (Brahma, Vishnu, and Shiva); regarded as the preserver, while Brahma and Shiva are respectively the creator and the destroyer. Vishnu appears already in the Rigveda as a solar divinity. There his chief achievement is striding over the heavens in three steps, explained as designating the three daily stations of the sun in his rising, culmination, and setting, the conception out of which grew the legend of the Vamana, or dwarf incarnation of Vishnu. (See Vamana.) He is the companion of Indra in drinking the soma and in battling with Vritra. At times he appears as sent by Indra, and strengthened by him, while at others he gives Indra strength, especially by preparing the soma for him. Not at first included among the Adityas, or sons of Aditi (whose number in the Vedic period varies from six to eight), when their number is raised to twelve, representing the sun in the twelve months of the year, Vishnu receives the first place among them. It is in the Mahabharata and the Ramayana that he appears without this solar character, and as gradually rising to his present supremacy as the most popular god of modern Hindu worship, while the Puranas represent the fully developed rivalry between Shiva and Vishnu and their worshippers, called respectively Shaivas and Vaishnavas. The most marked feature of the modern Vishnu is his incarnation in a portion of his essence on ten different occasions to deliver mankind from special dangers. These ten principal avatars ('descents,' 'incarnations') are (1) the Matsya, or 'fish'; (2) the Kurma, 'tortoise'; (3) the Varaha, 'boar'; (4) the Narasimha, 'man-lion'; (5) the Vamana, 'dwarf'; (6) Parashurama, or 'Rama with the ax'; (7) Ramachandra; (8) Krishna; (9) Buddha, by adopting whom the Brahmans apparently wished to effect a compromise between their own creed and Buddhism; and (10) Kalki, an incarnation, yet to come, in which Vishnu at the end of the four yugas or ages will destroy the wicked, and free the world from its enemies. (See the names.) These avatars some of the Puranas increase to 22 or 24. As in their treatment of the triad the modern Hindus elevate either Shiva or Vishnu to the supreme place, subordinating the other two, Vishnu is often identified with Narayana, the personified Purusha, or primeval living spirit, and is described as morning on the waters, and resting on Shesha, the serpent of infinity, while Brahma emerges from a lotus growing from his navel. His wife is Lakshmi or Sri, and his paradise Vaikuntha. He has a peculiar mark on his breast called Shrivatsa, and has a conch-shell, a discus, a club, a lotus, a bow, and a sword. Upon his wrist is the jewel Syamantaka, and on his breast the jewel Kaustubha. His vehicle is Garuda, who is half man, half bird (with the head, wings, talons, and beak of an eagle, and the body and limbs of a man), and whose face is white, wings red, and body golden. The Ganges issues from Vishnu's foot. He has slain countless demons, a number of whom are specified in various legends. He has a thousand names, all given in the Anushasana-parvan ('instruction-section') of the Mahabharata, with those of Shiva, which number 1,008. On Vishnu, see Muir's "Original Sanskrit Texts," IV, 63-293, and Monier-Williams's "Brahmanism and Hinduism," iii., v., and vi.

Vishnupurana (vish-nō-pō-rā'na). In Sanskrit literature, an important and typical Purana (see that word). It has been translated, with preface and many notes, by Wilson. A second edition of this translation has been greatly enriched by the further notes of Fitzedward Hall. It appears in Wilson's works, Vol. VI (London, 1864). Wilson's analysis of the Puranas in Vol. III, and his preface to the Vishnupurana, are the chief sources of information on the Puranas.

Visigoths (viz'i-goths). [From LL. Visigothi*, Visigothæ, West Goths.] The individuals of the more westerly of the two great historical divisions of the Goths. See Goths. The Visigoths founded a monarchy which continued in southern France until 507, and in Spain until 711. Also called West Goths.

Vision of Don Roderick. A narrative poem by Sir Walter Scott, published in 1811.

Vision of Judgment. 1. A poem by Southey, published in 1821.—2. A burlesque of this poem by Lord Byron.

Vision of Ezekiel (e-zē'ki-el), The. God the Father, with the symbols of the four Evangelists: a small but impressive painting by Raphael, in the Galleria Pitti, Florence. The God-head is treated perhaps too much like a Jupiter, but the grouping is admirable.

Vision of Mirza (mēr'zā), The. An allegory by Addison, published in the "Spectator," No. 159. It is a vision of human life.

Vision of Piers Plowman (pērs plōw'man). An allegorical and satirical poem by William Langland, begun about 1362, revised in 1377, and revised and enlarged until about 1393. It was very popular, as attested by its numerous MSS., and was printed in 1550, 1553, and 1561, in several editions. There have been several modern reprints, the most recent of which is that edited by Professor W. W. Skeat in 1887. This incorporates the collations of three MS. versions, of different dates, with notes. The book is really the "Vision of William concerning Piers Plowman," who is the subject, not the author. There are other visions incorporated, but this was the favorite character of Langland.

In the earlier part of the poem he is a blameless ploughman and a guide to men who are seeking the shrine of Truth, whilst in the latter part of it he is the blameless carpenter's son who alone can show us the Father. The ambiguity is surely not very great, and the reader who once apprehends this explanation will easily remember that the true Piers Plowman was certainly not a Middle-English author.

Skeat, Preface to Piers the Plowman, p. xxvii.

Viso, Monte. See Monte Viso.

Vistula (vis'tū-lā). [F. Vistule, L. Vistula, G. Weichsel, Pol. Wiśła.] A large river of northern Europe. It rises in Austrian Silesia in the Jablunka Mountains, forms part of the boundary between Austrian Silesia and Galicia on the one side and Prussian Silesia on the other; passes through Galicia, and forms part of the boundary between Galicia and Poland; traverses Poland; enters Prussia; separates near its mouth into the Vistula and Nogat; and then divides into the Danziger Vistula and the Elbinger Vistula, of which the former flows directly into the Gulf of Danzig and the latter into the Frischie Haf. Its chief tributaries are the San, Pilca, Bzga, and Brahe; the chief towns on its banks, Cracow, Warsaw, Plock, Thorn, and Danzig. Length, about 650 miles; navigable for small vessels from Cracow, for large vessels from the mouth of the San.

The origin of the name of this river [Vistula] (Germ. Weichsel, Vixel, Slav. Visla, Lat. Vistula) unfortunately can hardly be ascertained with certainty. It is sometimes regarded as originally and thoroughly Teutonic, sometimes as Slavonic, sometimes also as Slavo-Teutonic (Mullenhoff, ii. 207; J. v. Fierlinger, K. Z., xxvii. 479). The last seems to be the most probable.

Schrader, Aryan Peoples (tr. by Jevons), p. 429.

Vistula Governments. The official name of Russian Poland.

Visurgis (vi-sēr'jis). The Latin name of the Weser.

Vitalians (vi-tā'li-anz). A band of pirates who infested the Baltic and North seas at the end of the 14th and the beginning of the 15th century.

Vitalis (vē-tā'les). Pseudonym of the Swedish poet Sjöberg.

Vitalis (vi-tā'lis). See Ordericus.

Vita Nuova (vē-tā nō-ō'vā). [It., 'The New Life.'] A work by Dante, probably finished in 1307.

Dante wrote in his early manhood the "Vita Nuova"—the New or the Early Life—connecting, with a narrative of aspiration towards Beatrice as the occasion of them, sonnets and canzoni, representing artistically, according to the manner of that time, various moods of love.

Morley, English Writers, III. 402.

Vitebsk (vē-tebsk'). 1. A government of western Russia, surrounded by the governments of Livonia, Pskoff, Smolensk, Moghileff, Minsk, Vilna, and Courland. Area, 17,440 square miles. Population, 1,341,100.—2. The capital of the government of Vitebsk, situated on the Dvina in lat. 55° 15' N. It has considerable trade. Population (1888), 58,495.

Vitellius (vi-tel'i-us), Aulus. Born 15 A. D.: killed at Rome, Dec., 69 A. D. Roman emperor, a favorite of Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, and Nero. He was appointed governor in Lower Germany by Galba in 68, and was proclaimed emperor by the army at the beginning of 69. His generals Cæcina and Valens defeated Otho; and he entered Rome in the middle of 69. His forces were defeated by those of Vespasian under Antonius Primus.

Viterbo (vē-ter'bō). [ML. Viterbium, Biter-vum.] A city of the province of Rome, Italy, 41 miles north-northwest of Rome. It has a noted cathedral, and was formerly a papal residence. In the neighborhood are mineral springs and Etruscan antiquities. Population (1881), 19,654.

Viti (vē'tē), or Maviti (mā-vē'tē), also called Mazitu (mā-zē'tō). A tribe of marauders in East Africa, originally Zulus from the neighborhood of Sofala and Inhambane, who, about 1850, crossed the Zambesi and ravaged the region between the Rovuma and Rufiji rivers. Many settled finally southwest of Lake Nyassa, where they are called Mangoni (Livingstone, 1863). Others mixed with different tribes, especially with the Mahenge. Taking advantage of the fear inspired by the Maviti, other marauders, as the Waminde and the Wangindo, took their name, costume, and manners in order to facilitate their depredations.

Viti Archipelago. See Fiji Islands.

Vitiges (vi'ti-jēz). An East-Gothic king who reigned from 536 to about 540. He was taken captive to Constantinople by Belisarius.

Viti Levu (vē'tē lev'ō). The largest island of the Fiji group, and the most important in respect to population and fertility. Area, about 4,000 square miles. Pop. (1896), 50,000.

Vitoria, or Vittoria (vē-tō'rē-ā). [ML. Victoriaeum, Victoria.] The capital of the Basque province of Alava, Spain, situated on the Zadorra in lat. 42° 50' N., long. 2° 43' W. It is an important commercial and manufacturing town. A victory was gained there by the Allies under Wellington over the French under Joseph Bonaparte and Jourdan, June 21, 1813. Population (1887), 27,060.

Vitoria, Duke of. A title of Espartaco.

Vitré (vē-trā'). A town in the department of Ille-et-Vilaine, France, situated on the Vilaine 24 miles east of Rennes. It contains a castle, and a church of Notre Dame, and is noted for its old Breton aspect. Population (1891), 10,607.

Vitruvius Pollio (vi-trō'vi-us pol'i-ō), Marcus: called Vitruvius. Born at Verona. A famous Roman architect and engineer, military engineer under Caesar and Augustus. His treatise on architecture, in ten books ("De architectura"), dedicated to Augustus, is the only surviving Roman treatise on the subject. He seems to have been an unsuccessful architect: his book, however, was well known to Pliny, and on it was based almost all the earlier theory and practice of Renaissance and pseudo-classical architecture.

Vitry-le-François (vē-trō'le-frōi-swü'). [See def.] A town in the department of Marne, France, situated on the Marne 20 miles southeast of Châlons-sur-Marne. It was founded by Francis I. Population (1891), commune, 8,022.

Vittoria Corombona. See White Devil.

Vittorio (vit-tō'rē-ō). A town in the province of Treviso, Italy, situated on the Meschio 38 miles north of Venice. It is composed of the two former towns Ceneda and Serravalle. Ceneda was an important place in the middle ages. It has various works of art. Population of Vittorio (1881), 16,681.

Vitus (vi'tus). Saint. A saint of the Roman church, a martyr under Diocletian. His festival is celebrated June 15. At Ulm and Ravensburg and other places in Germany it was believed in the 17th century that good health could be secured for a year by dancing before his image at his festival, and bringing gifts: hence it is said that St. Vitus's dance came to be confounded with chorea, a nervous disorder, and he was invoked against it.

Vitznau (vits'nou). A small village in the canton of Lucerne, Switzerland, situated on the Lake of Lucerne 9 miles east-southeast of Lucerne. It is a tourist center.

Vivarais (vē-vā-rā'). [L. pagus Fivariensis.] An ancient district in Languedoc, France, corresponding nearly to the modern department of Ardèche. Capital, Viviers.

Vivian (viv'i-an), or Viviane, or Vivien. In the Arthurian cycle of romance, an enchantress, the mistress of Merlin. She brought up Lancelot in her palace, which was situated in the midst of a magical lake: hence her name "the Lady of the Lake." Tennyson has used the subject of her subjugation of Merlin in his "Merlin and Vivien" in the "Idylls of the King."

At length this renowned magician [Merlin] disappeared entirely from England. His voice alone was heard in a forest, where he was enclosed in a bush of hawthorn: he had been entrapped in this awkward residence by means of a charm he had communicated to his mistress Vivian or Viviane, who, not believing in the spell, had tried it on her lover. The lady was sorry for the accident, but there was no extracting her admirer from his thorny coverture.

Dunlop, Hist. of Prose Fiction, I. 154.

It . . . seems evident that it is to the Hwitelean, or Chwiteian of Merlinus Silvestris (the historical Merlin of Scotland), that we are to attribute the origin of Viviane of the romances of Chivalry, and who acts so conspicuous a part in those compositions, although it is true that there is not much resemblance betwixt the two names. But if we look into the poems of Merlin Sylvestris, we shall find that the female personage of this name, which by the French romances might easily be modified into Viviane, is repeatedly referred to by the bard in his vaticinations. It also seems probable, as Chwiteian signifies a female who appears and disappears, and also as the word bears some resemblance in sound to Sibylla, that the bard, by a confusion of terms and ideas not uncommon in early writers, coined this name as an appellation for some imaginary character, and thus furnished the original of Viviane.

T. Price, Literary Remains, I. 144.

Vivian Grey. A novel by Disraeli, published in 1826-27.

Viviani (vē-vē-ā'nē), Vincenzo. Born at Florence, April 5, 1622; died Sept. 22, 1703. An Italian mathematician, a pupil of Galileo, and his companion during the last years of the great astronomer's life. His theoretical restoration of the lost books of Aristotle and of Apollonius of Perga on conic sections was verified by the discovery of the text.

Vivien de Saint-Martin (vē-vyan' dē san-mār-tān'), Louis. Born at Saint Martin-de-Fontenay, May 17, 1802; died Jan. 3, 1897. A noted French geographer, one of the founders of the Geographical Society of Paris. He founded in 1852 the "Attieneum français," and edited "L'Année géographique" 1863-76. He also wrote "Étude sur la géographie grecque et latine de l'Inde" (1858-60), "Le nord d'Afrique dans l'antiquité grecque et romaine" (1863), etc., and edited (1877-90) "Nouveau dictionnaire de géographie universelle."

Viviers (vē-vyā'). [ML. Fivarias, Fivarium.] A small town in the department of Ardèche, France, situated on the Rhone southeast of Privas.

It comprises the greater part of the ancient principality of Vladimir. Area, 18,864 square miles. Population, 1,456,600. 2. The capital of the government of Vladimir, situated on the Klyasma 110 miles east by north of Moscow. It contains two ancient cathedrals. That of the Assumption was rebuilt in the 13th century after destruction by the Tatars, and, though twice since restored, retains much of its old character and interest. It was until the middle of the 15th century the metropolitan church of Russia. It possesses rich silver shrines, tombs of princes and metropolitans, and many other historical relics. That of Dimitri of Solun is remarkable for the abundant sculpture, representing animals, birds, foliage, and the like, which adorns its walls of white sandstone. The great portal is one of the finest of its type. Population (1885-89), 20,702.

Vladimir, Saint, "The Great." Died 1015. Grand Prince of Russia 980-1015. He extended the Russian dominions and promoted Christianity.

Vogler (fō'gler), Georg Joseph, called Abbé. Born at Würzburg, Germany, June 15, 1749; died at Darmstadt, May 6, 1814. A German organist, composer, and writer on music; kapellmeister successively in Mannheim, Stockholm, and Darmstadt, and conductor of schools of music in those cities.

Vogt (fōkt), Karl. Born at Giessen, Germany, July 5, 1817; died at Geneva, Switzerland, May 5, 1895. A distinguished German naturalist. He studied at Giessen (under Liebig) and Bern, and later associated himself with Agassiz, taking an important part in the elaboration of the latter's great work on fishes. He was appointed professor of zoology at Giessen in 1847, but soon lost his chair for political reasons. In 1852 he became professor of geology at Geneva, and subsequently obtained the additional chair of zoology at the same institute. He conducted an expedition to the North Cape in 1861, and in 1878 entered the Swiss National Assembly. He was an extreme Darwinist and a zealous advocate of the doctrine of materialism. Among his works are "Im Gebirg und auf den Gletschern" (1843), "Lehrbuch der Geologie und Petrefaktenkunde" (1846), "Physiologische Briefe" (1845-46), "Ocean und Mittelmeer" (1848), "Tierstaaten" (1851), "Kohlerglaube und Wissenschaft" (1853-1855), "Säugetiere in Wort und Bild" (1883), "Praktische vergleichende Anatomie" with Emilie Yung (1885-). Voiture (vō-tür'). Vincent. Born at Amiens, France, 1598; died May 26, 1648. A French poet and man of letters, patronized at court. He is noted for his letters and for his short poems (sonnets, chansons, etc.).

There was, in the first place, the school of the coterie poets, who devoted themselves to producing vers de société, either for the ladies or for the great men of the period. The chief of this school was beyond all question Voiture. This admirable writer of prose and verse published absolutely nothing during his lifetime, though his work was in private the delight of the salons.

Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 275.

Vokes (vōks), Rosina. Born at London, 1858; died at Babbacombe, near Torquay, Jan. 29, 1894. An English actress. She first appeared in the English provinces in pantomime with her brother Fred and her sisters Victoria and Jessie. In 1870, with Fawdon Vokes, who assumed the name, they made a success in London as "the Vokes family." They were also very successful in America, where they appeared annually for many years. Rosina married Cecil Clay in 1877. She was remarkable for her fun, originality, and graceful dancing.

Volsunga Saga (vōl'sōng-gā sā'gā). [ON. Völ-sungasaga.] In Old Norse literature, the mythical history of the Volsungs and the Nibelungs. Its central hero is Sigurd the Volsung, the Siegfried of the "Nibelungenlied." Unlike the German version, the story has throughout a heathen character, and the gods in person enter into its action. It was probably written in Norway not long after the middle of the 13th century. Its material was taken in part from ancient popular legends, partly from old heroic poems, some of which are preserved in the Elder Edda. It, and not the "Nibelungenlied," is the principal source of Wagner's "Ring of the Nibelungs."

Volta (vol'tā). A small town in Italy, 13 miles north-northwest of Mantua. Here, July 26-27, 1848, the Austrians drove back the Sardinians.

Volta, Count Alessandro. Born at Como, Italy, Feb. 18, 1745; died there, March 5, 1827. A celebrated Italian physicist, famous for his researches and inventions in electricity; professor in Como and Pavia. He was made by Napoleon senator of Lombardy. He invented the electrophore, electroscop, condenser, and the voltaic pile (described 1800, and named from him).

Voltaire (vol-tār'): the assumed name of François Marie Arouet (ā-rō-ā'). Born at Paris, Nov. 21, 1694; died at Paris, May 30, 1778. A famous French writer. He took the name of Voltaire, the origin of which is still in dispute, in 1718, a short time after the performance of his tragedy "Edeipe." His father, a notary connected with the tribunal of the Châtelet, was a man of some wealth. Young Arouet was one of the most brilliant pupils of the Collège Louis-le-Grand (then in the hands of the Jesuits). Before he was out of college he began writing poetry. His wit, as well as the influence of his godfather, the Abbé de Châteaufort, secured for him an introduction into the most aristocratic circles of Parisian society. But the freedom of his utterances soon brought him into trouble. Between 1716 and 1726 he was twice exiled from Paris, and twice thrown a prisoner into the Bastille, both for things that had been written by him and on mere suspicion, and always without a trial. His last imprisonment was due to his resenting an insult offered him by a dissolute young nobleman, the Chevalier de Rohan. He was soon liberated, however, and at once went to England, where he remained over two years (1726-29). Already a celebrated dramatic writer, owing to the success of "Edeipe," he increased his fame by the publication of his epic poem on Henry the Fourth, "La Henriade," the first complete edition of which was dedicated to the Queen of England. He returned to France in 1729, and won repeated successes both as a poet and a historian. In 1734 he took up his residence with the Marquis du Châtelet in the Château of Cirey in Lorraine, where he resided most of the time until that lady's death in 1749. It was during this period of his life that he became his biographer of France and "a gentleman of the king's bedchamber." He also had some intercourse with Pope Benedict XIV., to whom he dedicated his tragedy "Mahomet." After Madame du Châtelet's death he returned to Paris, but soon left France for Prussia, where Frederick the Great, who had always admired him, had often requested him to take up his residence. There he remained from July, 1750, to March, 1753. Voltaire and Frederick, who had met almost as lovers, parted bitter enemies, and the great writer was arrested on his way through Frankfurt, at the request of the king's representative, although not guilty, nor even accused, of offense, and was treated with harshness. During his stay in Berlin and Potsdam he had completed and published one of his most important works, "Le siècle de Louis XIV." His return to France was followed by a period of wandering caused by the refusal of the arbitrary government of Louis XV. to allow him to come to Paris. He finally settled in Geneva (1756), whence two years later he moved to Ferney, a large estate only a few miles distant, which he purchased, and where he spent the remainder of his life (1758-78). Much of his time was given to the defense and protection of the victims of religious intolerance and fanaticism. He thus spent about two years getting justice done to the family and memory of a Protestant, Jean Calas, who had been put to death upon a false accusation of killing one of his sons to prevent his turning Catholic. He was constantly at work, also, revising his formerly published writings, issuing numerous pamphlets, both in prose and verse, in favor of freedom of thought, and carrying on an extensive correspondence. Early in 1778, during the reign of Louis XVI., at the request of his friends he determined to visit Paris, where he was received with great enthusiasm. The fatigue of the journey and the excitement of his reception proved too much for his weakened frame, and he died at Paris, May 30, 1778. His most important works are: tragedies, "Edipe," "Brutus," "Zaïre" (considered the best), "Mérope," "Mahomet," "Alzire," "Tancrède"; poems, "La Henriade," "Épître à l'ariane," "La mort d'Adrienne Lecouvreur," "Discours sur l'homme," "La loi naturelle," "Le désastre de Lisbonne," "Le mondain," and the one which his admirers would prefer he had never written, "La Pucelle"; history, "Histoire de Charles XII.," "Essai sur les mœurs et l'esprit des nations," "Le siècle de Louis XIV.," "Histoire de Russie sous Pierre le Grand"; philosophy, "Dictionnaire philosophique"; literary criticism, "Commentaire sur Corneille"; fiction, "Candide," "La princesse de Babylone," "L'Ingénu," "L'homme aux quarante écus," "Zadig"; "miscellanies (which fill a very large number of volumes), "Lettres philosophiques," "Traité de la tolérance." His correspondence is considered as fine as that of Madame de Sévigné. The best editions of his works are the Edition de Kehl (Kehl, 1784 et seq., 72 vols.), Beuchot's edition (Paris, 1829 et seq., 72 vols.), and Moland's edition (Paris, Garnier, 1875 et seq., 52 vols.). A selection of his works (8 volumes) was edited by Georges Bengesco, who is also the author of a bibliography of Voltaire's works, in 4 volumes.

Volterra (vol-ter'ra). A town in the province of Pisa, Italy, 35 miles southwest of Florence: the ancient Volaterræ. It contains a cathedral, a stately Romanesque structure, in the Pisan arcaded style, consecrated in 1120, and enlarged about a century later. The marble pulpit bears 12th-century scriptural reliefs, and rests on four granite columns, two of them with lions. There are some fine tombs, and paintings by several of the great masters, particularly a superb "Annunciation" by Signorelli. The Porta all'Arco is one of the original gates of the old Etruscan city. It is round-arched, 20 feet high and 12 wide, the outer arch formed of 19 enormous blocks of travertine assembled without cement, and bearing three curious heads in relief on the keystone and impost. The gate-passage, 30 feet long, with grooves for portcullis, is Roman.

Vondel (von'del), Joost van den. Born at Cologne, Nov. 17, 1587; died at Amsterdam in 1679. A Dutch dramatist and poet: the greatest name in Dutch literature. His parents, who had fled to Cologne from Antwerp, removed to Amsterdam in 1597. After his father's death in 1603 he married, and kept the stocking-shop in which he had succeeded his father. This business was successfully continued long after he had acquired a literary reputation, but in 1657 the mismanagement of it by his eldest son led to bankruptcy. His own small fortune was sacrificed, and he was forced to accept a clerkship where from his seventieth to his eightieth year he labored for a pittance. In 1668, after he had been obliged to resign his position on account of the weakness of old age, he finally received a small state pension. His literary career was begun with the drama "Het Pascha" ("The Pascha"), produced in 1612 before the "Rhetorical Chamber," of which he was a member (the so-called Flemish Chamber of the Laverder Flower). In 1619, after the performance of the first of his biblical dramas, the tragedy "Hierusalem verwoest" ("Jerusalem Destroyed"), he went over to the Chamber of the Eglantine. His subsequent works are the tragedy "Palamedes," and "Amsterdamse Heecuba" ("The Amsterdam Heecuba"; a free version of Seneca), both 1625; the tragedy (the greatest of his dramas) "Gysbrecht van Aemstel," 1637; "Maegden" ("St. Ursula") and "Gebroeders" ("Brothers," i. e., the sons of Saul), both 1639; "Joseph in Dothan" and "Joseph in Egypten," both 1640; "Peter en Pauwels" ("Peter and Paul"), 1641; "Maria Stuart," 1646; "De Leeuwendalers" (a pastoral play in celebration of the peace of Westphalia) and "Salomon" ("Solomon"), both 1648; the choral drama "Lucifer," 1654; "Salmonens," 1657; "Jephtha," 1659; "Koning David in ballingschap" ("King David in Exile"), "Koning David herstelt" ("King David Restored"), and "Samson," all 1660; "Adonias" ("Adonis"), 1661; "Batavian Brothers," 1662; "Facton" ("Phaethon"), 1663; "Adam in ballingschap" ("Adam in Exile"), 1664; "Zungchin," 1666; and "Noah," 1667. He was also the author of translations from the classics (among them Vergil's "Æneid," 1660, and Ovid's "Metamorphoses," 1661), and of versions of classical originals (from Seneca, "Hippolytus," 1628; from Sophocles, the "Electra," 1638, "Koning Edipus" ("Edipus Tyrannus"), 1660, and "Hercules," 1663; from Euripides, "Ifigenia in Taurien" ("Iphigenia in Tauris"), 1666, and "Feniciaensche Ifigenia" ("The Phenician Iphigenia"), 1668). His literary works reflect clearly his own political and religious views. He was at the outset a supporter of the house of Orange, as is plainly visible in the "Pascha," from 1612. The action of the Synod of Dort, and the progress of Calvinism, brought about a revision, and the "Palamedes," with the subtitle of "Murdered Innocence," from 1625, represents under a thin disguise the trial of Olden-Barneveldt, and cost the poet a summons before the court at Amsterdam, and a fine of 300 gulden. In 1626 he wrote in popular verse against the Calvinistic zealots. In 1641 he joined the Roman Catholic Church, and subsequently wrote in praise of it. In this category of writings belong, among others, the didactic poems "Altaergeheimnissen" ("Mysteries of the Altar"), 1645; "Johannes de boetgezant" ("John the Evangelist"), 1662; "De heerlijkheid der kerke" ("The Glory of the Church"), 1663; and the tragedy of "Maria Stuart," already mentioned. The dramatic poem "Lucifer," the greatest of his works, is considered by many Dutch critics to be an allegorical account of the rise of the Netherlands against Philip of Spain. He has been called "the Dutch Shakspeare." His collected works, together with a life of the poet, were published at Amsterdam, 1850-69, in 12 vols.

It has important forests, and manufactures of iron, cotton, etc. It was formed chiefly from part of Lorraine. Area, 2,266 square miles. Population (1891), 410,196.

Voss (fos), Johann Heinrich. Born at Sommersdorf, Mecklenburg, Feb. 20, 1751; died at Heidelberg, March 29, 1826. A German poet. He studied first theology and then philology at Göttingen, where he was one of the founders of the poetic brotherhood, the so-called "Göttingen Haubund." In 1775 he was appointed rector of the school at Otterndorf, which position he exchanged in 1782 for one at Eutin. On account of ill health he afterward gave this up, and in 1802 went to Jena, and in 1805 to Heidelberg, where he lived until his death. His principal original work is the idyl "Luise," published first in 1784 (in its complete form in 1795). His fame is based principally upon his translations of the classical writers, particularly of Homer: the Odyssey appeared in 1781; the Iliad, together with a revised version of the Odyssey, in 1793. He also translated Vergil in 1790, Horace and Hesiod in 1806, Theocritus and Bion and Moschus in 1808, Tibullus in 1810, and Aristophanes in 1821. He also translated, together with his sons Heinrich and Abraham, Shakspeare's plays (1819-29). His complete poetical works were published at Leipzig in 1835.

Votan (vò-tän'). A hero-god of Indians of the Maya stock in southern Mexico and Guatemala. He is described in the "Book of Votan," an ancient work in the Tzendal language of Chiapas; this has come down to us in a transcript in Roman text. Votan was descended from Chan, the serpent. He came from over the sea, introduced civilization into southern Mexico, and founded the "empire" of Xibalba, supposed by some to be Palenque. Then he disappeared, and was worshiped as a god. Votan was perhaps a generic name for several chiefs. Some authors suppose that the original Votan came from Cuba about 600 (?) or 955 (?) B. C.

Voullon (vò-lò'n'). A village in the department of Vienne, France, south of Poitiers. Here (not at Vouillé), in 507, the Franks under Clovis defeated the West Goths under Alaric II. Vox Clamantis (vòks kla-man'tis). [L., 'the voice of one crying.'] An allegorical poem in Latin, by Gower.

Voyage autour de ma Chambre. [Journey around my Room.] A novel by Xavier de Maistre, published in 1794.

The "Voyage autour de ma Chambre" [of De Maistre] (readers will be informed or reminded) is a whimsical description of the author's meditations and experiences when confined to barracks for some military peccadillo. After a fashion, which has found endless imitators since, the prisoner contemplates the various objects in his room, spins little romances to himself about them and about his beloved Madame de Hauteastel, moralises on the faithfulness of his servant Joannetti, and so forth. The "Expédition Nocturne," a less popular sequel, is not very different in plan. Saintsbury, French Novelists, p. 144.

Voyages de Cyrus, Les. A work by the Chevalier Ramsay, the friend of Fénelon and tutor to the sons of the Pretender, first published in 1727. It was translated into English in 1730.

Voyer d'Argenson. See Argenson.

Vryburg (vri'berg). The capital of British Bechuanaland, South Africa.

Vulcan (vul'kàn). 1. In Roman mythology, the god of fire and the working of metals, and the patron of all handicraftsmen. Originally an independent deity, he became, with the advance of time, completely identified with the Greek Hephestus. He was the son of Jupiter and Juno, or of Juno alone, and was born with deformed feet, though according to late myths his lameness came from his having been hurled down from heaven by Jupiter in a fit of anger. He was the divine artist, the creator of all that was beautiful as well as of all that was mechanically wonderful in the abodes of the gods. On earth various volcanoes, as Lemnos and Etna, were held to be his workshops, and the Cyclopes were his journeymen. He had the power of conferring life upon his creations, and was thus the author of Pandora, and of the golden dogs of Alcinous. In art he was represented as a bearded man, usually with the short sleeveless or one-sleeved tunic of the workman, with a conical cap, holding hammer and tongs or other attributes of the smith, and sometimes with indication of his lameness. When Jupiter conceived Minerva in his head, the goddess was delivered full-armed upon the stroke of an ax in the hands of Vulcan.

2. A hypothetical planet between the sun and the planet Mercury. An object supposed to be a planet was seen crossing the sun's disk on March 26, 1859. The period of revolution assigned to it was something over 19 days, and its distance from the sun was estimated at about 13,000,000 miles. The existence of Vulcan, however, has not been confirmed (may, indeed, be said to have been practically disproved) by subsequent careful observations.

Vulcanalia (vul-ka-nā'li-ä). An ancient Roman festival in honor of Vulcan, celebrated on Aug. 23 with games in the Flaminian circus, near the temple of the god, and with sacrifices of fishes. As part of the observance on this day, work was begun by lamp-light in honor of the fire-god.

Vulcan Pass. A pass in the Carpathians, between Transylvania and Rumania, about lat. 45° 25' N., long. 23° 17' E.

Vulgar Errors. See Pseudodoxia Epidemica.

Vulgate (vul'gät). [ML. Fulgata, sc. editio or versio, 'the published' (i. e. 'commonly circulated') 'edition' or 'version.'] The Latin version of the Scriptures accepted as the authorized version of the Roman Catholic Church. It was prepared by Jerome about the close of the 4th century, partly by translation from the original, partly by revision of prior Latin versions. It gradually came into general use between the 6th and 9th century. The Anglo-Saxon translations were made from it, and also Wyclif's English version, while other English versions from Tyndale's onward have been much influenced by it. The Vulgate was the first book printed (about 1455). The Council of Trent ordered that the "old and vulgate edition," approved by the "usage of so many ages," should be the only Latin version used in "public lectures, disputations, sermons, and expositions." Authorized editions were afterward published under Sixtus V. in 1590 and Clement VIII. in 1592-93. The latter, or Clementine edition, is at present the accepted standard of the Roman Catholic Church, and is the basis of the Donay Bible. The religious terminology of the languages of western Europe has been in great part derived from or influenced by the Vulgate.

This Vulgate or received version (the word vulgate means 'currently received'), as it actually existed in the Middle Ages and at the time of the Reformation, was not the pure text of Jerome, but was Jerome's version considerably modified by things which had been carried over from the older Latin translations taken from the Greek.

Waal (wāl). The southern arm of the Rhine, in Gelderland and South Holland, Netherlands. It separates from the other branch about 10 miles southeast of Arnhem, taking about two thirds of the entire stream; and unites with the Meuse and flows on as the Merwede and Old Meuse.

Wabash (wā'bash). The capital of Wabash County, Indiana, situated on the Wabash 75 miles north-northeast of Indianapolis. Population (1900), 8,618.

Wabash. A river which rises in Mercer County, Ohio, flows west and southwest through Indiana, forms part of the boundary between Indiana and Illinois, and joins the Ohio at the union of Indiana, Illinois, and Kentucky. Its chief tributary is the White River. On its banks are Logansport, Lafayette, Terre Haute, and Vincennes. Length, about 550 miles.

Wace (wäs), or Eustace, erroneously called Robert. Born in the island of Jersey about 1124; died about 1174. An Anglo-Norman poet. He received a prebend at Bayeux under Henry II, and was attached to the Anglo-Norman court. He wrote two poetical romances: "Roman de Brut," and "Roman de Rou," or "Romance of Rollo," which was a poetical version of the story of the Norman conquest by William of Poitiers, chaplain to William the Conqueror. Wace made some additions, including a third part. See Brut and Roman de Brut.

Wacht am Rhein (vächt äm rîn), Die. ["The Watch on the Rhine."] A German popular song, words by Schneckenburger (1840), music by Karl Wilhelm (1854). It enjoyed great vogue in the war of 1870-71, becoming a national song. Other composers also wrote music for it.

Wachtel (väch'tel), Theodor. Born at Hamburg, March 10, 1823; died at Berlin, Nov. 14, 1893. A German tenor singer. He was a groom and driver for his father, who kept a livery-stable. He first sang in England in 1862, came to the United States in 1871 and 1875. He was noted for his high C, which he sang as a chest note, and not in falsetto.

Waco (wä'kō). The capital of McLennan County, Texas, situated on the Brazos 93 miles north-northeast of Austin. It has varied manufactures. Population (1900), 20,686.

Wadai (wä-dī'). A Mohammedan kingdom of the eastern Sudan, Africa, between lat. 8° 20' and 18° 20' N., bordering on Kanem and Baghirmi in the west, on Tibbuland in the north, on Darfur in the east, and on Dar Runga (its tributary) in the south. It is within the French sphere of influence. The country is generally an arid sandy plain, where the camel and the ostrich thrive; only in the southern and eastern parts can it be called tolerably fertile. The population, numbering 2,000,000-4,000,000, is mixed. The Arabs and Fulahs, though numerous, are not dominant. The kingdom belongs to the negro tribe of Maba, which, under Abd-el-Kerim, introduced Islam about 1635. Life and property were unsafe until Sultan Ali established some order (since 1859). The chief exports are ivory, feathers, and slaves which go to Bengazi or Egypt. See Maba.

Wadan (wü-dän'). The chief town of Adrar, in the western part of the Sahara.

Waddington (wod'ing-ton; F. pron. vä-dän-tōn'), William Henry. Born at St.-Remi, Eure-et-Loire, France, Dec. 11, 1826; died Jan. 13, 1894. A French statesman and archaeologist. He entered the National Assembly in 1871, and the Senate in 1870; was minister of public instruction in 1873 and 1876-77; was minister of foreign affairs 1877-79; and was French plenipotentiary at the Congress of Berlin 1878, premier Feb.-Dec., 1879, and ambassador to Great Britain 1883-93. He wrote memoirs of an archaeological journey to Asia Minor, "Mélanges de numismatique et de philologie" (1861), "Voyage archéologique en Grèce et en Asie Mineure" (1868-77).

Wade (wād), Benjamin Franklin. Born near Springfield, Mass., Oct. 27, 1800; died at Jefferson, Ohio, March 2, 1878. An American lawyer and statesman. He was Whig and later Republican United States senator from Ohio 1851-69; was an anti-slavery leader; opposed the Kansas-Nebraska Bill, etc.; and favored the Homestead Bill, confiscation in the war, and emancipation. He was acting Vice-President under Johnson, and commissioner to Santo Domingo in 1871.

Wadelai (wä-de-lī'). A town in equatorial Africa, on the Nilo north of Albert Nyanza. It was a main station of Emin Pasha.

Wadham (wod'äm) College. A college of Oxford University, founded in 1612 by Nicholas Wadham. The chapel, despite its date, is built in the Perpendicular style: it possesses good glass. The gateway and the framed wooden ceiling of the hall are also noteworthy.

Wadidikimo (wä-dē-dē-kē'mō). See Pygmies.

Wadman (wod'män), Widow. A character in Sterne's "Tristram Shandy." She has a tender feeling for Uncle Toby, and the scene where among other encouragements she approaches her face nearer and nearer to his, that he may extract a supposition something from her eye, is often referred to.

Wadsworth (wodz'wërth), James Samuel. Born at Geneseo, N.Y., Oct. 30, 1807; died near Chancellorsville, Va., May 8, 1864. An American general. After making several voyages to the East Indies, he settled in Jamaica, and in 1679 joined the buccaners. He was with Dampier on the Isthmus of Panama in 1680, and on account of a quarrel was left among the Indians, living with them until 1684. In 1688-90 he was in North America. He published "A New Voyage and Description of the Isthmus of America" (1699; French, German, and Swedish translations). It is the first good English description of the Isthmus, and is important in connection with the history of the buccaners.

Waghäusel (väg'hoi-zel). A village in Baden, in the neighborhood of Karlsruhe. Here, June 21, 1849, the Prussians defeated the Baden insurgents.

Wagner, Faust's funulus, a pedant, in Goethe's "Faust." He is also introduced in Marlowe's "Dr. Faustus," with some of the same characteristics.

According to Hinrichs, Faust represents Philosophy, and Wagner Empiricism. Dintzer calls the latter "the representative of dead pedantry, of knowledge mechanically acquired"; while other critics consider that he symbolizes the Philistine element in German life,—the hopelessly material, prosaic, and commonplace.

Taylor, Notes to Faust.

Wagner (väg'ner), Adolf Heinrich Gotthilf. Born at Erlangen, Bavaria, March 25, 1835. A German political economist, son of Rudolf Wagner; professor at Berlin from 1870. He is noted for his works on finance, and as an advocate of the "socialism of the chair."

Wagner, Moritz. Born at Bayreuth, Bavaria, Oct. 3, 1813; died at Munich, 1887. A German traveler, naturalist, and geographer; brother of Rudolf Wagner. Among his works are "Lehrbuch der vergleichenden Anatomie" (1834-35), "Icones physiologicae" (1839-40), "Lehrbuch der Physiologie" (1839), "Handatlas der vergleichenden Anatomie" (1841), "Handwörterbuch der Physiologie" (1842-53), "Neurologische Untersuchungen" (1854), "Der Kampf um die Seele" (1857), "Vorstudien" on the brain (1860-62).

Wagner, Rudolf Johannes von. Born at Leipsic, Feb. 13, 1822; died at Würzburg, Oct. 4, 1880. A German chemist and technologist. He wrote "Lehrbuch der Chemie," "Handbuch der chemischen Technologie," "Theorie und Praxis der Gewerbe," "Die chemische Fabrikindustrie," etc.

Wagner, Wilhelm Richard. Born at Leipsic, May 22, 1813; died at Venice, Feb. 13, 1883.

A celebrated German operatic composer and poet. His father, who was a clerk to the police-courts of Leipsic, died a few months after his birth, and his mother married Ludwig Geyer and removed to Dresden. He was educated at Dresden and Leipsic; matriculated at the University of Leipsic in 1830; and studied music at Leipsic. At this time he had a great enthusiasm for Beethoven. He was chorus-master at Würzburg in 1833, in the theater where his elder brother Albert was actor and stage manager; music director at Magdeburg 1834-36; conductor at Königsberg in 1836, when he married Fraulcin Planer; music director at Riga 1837-39; and lived in Paris 1839-42, where he struggled in vain to obtain a footing in some theater, and even offered himself as chorus-singer ("choriste"). He, however, studied and wrote constantly, and finished his "Faust" overture in 1840, though it was not published till 1855; this is his first markedly original performance. In 1841 he composed his "Fliegende Holländer," and endeavored unsuccessfully to get his "Rienzi" produced at Paris. About this time the "Volksbuch" of the Tannhäuser legend came into his possession, and he was struck with its possibilities. From this he was led to study the poems of William von Eschenbach and the "Loherangrin." He wrote the first sketches for his "Tannhäuser" in 1842. "Rienzi" was produced at Dresden in 1842, and was a success. The next year "Der Fliegende Holländer" was produced there, with Madame Schroder-Devrient as Senta. He was appointed court kapellmeister at Dresden in 1843, where he remained for seven years. "Tannhäuser" was produced there in 1845, and was a comparative failure. He got into pecuniary difficulties, and his arrest was ordered for alleged participation in the revolutionary movements of 1849; but, with the assistance of Liszt, he escaped to Paris. He lived chiefly at Zurich until 1859; and was in London in 1855 and in Paris 1859-61. Ludwig II., king of Bavaria, sent for him to return to Germany in 1861, and from this time his life was comparatively free from struggle. He settled at Munich in 1864, and lived near Lucerne from 1866 till 1872. In 1869 he married Cosima, the daughter of Liszt; and settled at Bayreuth in 1872. His theater was founded there in 1872, and completed in 1876. The first performance in it was the "Nibelungen" tetralogy, and in 1882 "Parsifal" was produced there. He went to London in 1877, but, his health beginning to give way, he went to Venice, where he died. He was buried in the grounds of "Wahnfried," his own house at Bayreuth. Among the many characteristics of his art theory are these: the choice of a general subject in which the mythical and heroic elements are prominent; the amalgamation of poetry, music, action, and scenic effect into the most intimate union as equally important cooperating elements; the desertion of the conventionalities of the common Italian opera, especially of its sharply defined and contrasted movements and its tendency to display of mere virtuosity; the abundant use of leading motives as a means to continuous and reiterated emotional effect; the elaboration of the orchestral parts, so that in them is furnished an unbroken presentation of or commentary on the entire plot; and the free use of new and remarkable means of effect, both scenic and instrumental. The Wagnerian ideal is often called (sometimes derisively) "the music of the future," from the title of one of Wagner's essays. While Wagnerism is best exemplified in the great dramas of Wagner himself, its qualities may be seen more or less in almost all the dramatic music of the last half of this century. His works include the operas "Rienzi" (1842), "Der Fliegende Holländer" ("The Flying Dutchman," 1843), "Tannhäuser" (first performed in 1845), "Loherangrin" (1846), "Der Ring des Nibelungen" (including "Das Rheingold," "Die Walküre," "Siegfried," "Gotterdammerung"; first performed as a whole in the autumn of 1876), "Tristan und Isolde" (1865), "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg" (1868), "Parsifal" (1882); overtures, sonatas, songs, orchestral and choral works, piano-forte pieces, etc. His literary works are contained in ten volumes (1871-85), including the poems for his operas, much critical work, "Das Kunstwerk der Zukunft" ("The Art-Work of the Future," 1850), "Oper und Drama," "Beethoven," "Religion und Kunst," "Bayreuther Blätter," etc.

Wagram (vä'gräm), or Deutsch-Wagram (doiech'vä'gräm). A village 9 miles northeast of Vienna. Here, July 5-6, 1809, the French under Napoleon (about 150,000) defeated the Austrians (about 120,000) under Archduke Charles. Loss on each side, about 25,000.

Wagram, Prince of. A title of the French general Berthier.

Wagstaff (wag'stäf), Simon. The pseudonym of Swift in "Polite Conversation."

Wahhabees, or Wahabis (wä-hä'bēz). The followers of Abd-el-Wahhab (1691-1787), a Mohammedan reformer, who opposed all practices not sanctioned by the Koran. His successors formed a powerful dominion whose chief seat was in Nejd in central Arabia. They were overthrown by Ibrahim Pasha in 1818, but afterward regained much of their former power in central Arabia. Also Wahhabites.

Wahlstatt (väl'stät), Battle of, or Battle of Liegnitz. A battle between the Mongols and the Germans under Duke Henry II. of Silesia, fought April 9, 1241, at Wahlstatt, a village 6 miles southeast of Liegnitz, in Silesia. The Mongols were victorious, but retired from Germany.

Waiblingen (vä'bling-en). A town in the Neckar circle, Württemberg, situated on the Rems 7 miles northeast of Stuttgart. (Compare Waiblinger.) Population (1890), 4,786.

Waiblinger (vä'bling-er). A surname of the Hohenstaufen, who held Waiblingen in the 12th century. From it came by corruption the Italian "Ghibelline."

Wailatpuan (wä'lä-t'pö-an). [From wai-latpu, the plural of wai-lat, a Cayuse man.] A linguistic stock of North American Indians, formerly living in Oregon and Washington. The Cayuse and Molale are the two tribes of this stock. Number (1893), about 446.

Wain (wän), Charles's. In astronomy, the seven brightest stars in the constellation Ursa Major, or the Great Bear, which has been called a wagon since the time of Homer. Two of the stars are known as "the pointers," because, being nearly in a straight line with the pole-star, they direct an observer to it. Also called the Plow, the Great Dipper, the Northern Car, and sometimes the Butcher's Cleaver. (The name Charles's Wain, or Charles' Wain, is a modern alteration of the earlier Carl's wain, from late AS. carles wæn, the carl's or churl's wain, or farmer's wagon. The word wain came to be associated with the name Charles with reference to Charlemagne, the group being also called in ME. Charlemaynes wayne. In the 17th century it was associated with the names of Charles I. and Charles II.)

Wain, The Lesser. Ursa Minor.

Wäinämöinen. See the extract.

The Kalevala begins with a cosmogony, which certainly offers interesting features for comparison, but in which there is much that may be foreign to the original heathen conceptions. Then the epic deals with the adventures of the three heroes Wäinämöinen, Ilmarinen, and Lemminkäinen. These heroes of Kaleva go into the hostile north-country of Pohjola as suitors, to fetch a bride, who is finally won by Ilmarinen; they return later to rob the Sampo treasure. Amongst the labours which Louhi, the hostess of Pohjola, lays upon them is a journey to Tuonela, with which a description of the lower regions is connected. La Saussaye, Science of Religion, p. 304.

Waite (wät), Morrison Remick. Born at Lyme, Conn., Nov. 29, 1816; died at Washington, D. C., March 23, 1888. An American jurist. He graduated at Yale in 1837; was admitted to the bar in 1839; became a leader of the bar in Ohio; was counsel for the United

In 1504 he became professor of geography in the college founded by the Duke of Lorraine at St. Dié. In 1507 he published a little treatise in Latin, the "Cosmographie introductio," printed on the college press in several editions, all of which are now very rare. Latin translations of the letters of Vespucci (see that name) are given as an appendix. In this book he says: "And the fourth part of the world having been discovered by Americans, it may be called America; that is, the land of Americans or America." This suggestion, in an obscure book, was eventually adopted, and America thus became the name of the New World. It should be noted that Waldseemüller proposed the name only for the region now known as South America, to which it was restricted for some time. Waldseemüller, with Ringmann ("Philosins"), Walter Lud ("Lindovius"), and other young students at St. Dié, prepared an edition of Ptolemy which was eventually published by Waldseemüller at Strasburg (1513). It contains curious maps of the New World, but the name America does not appear in it.

He was of noble family, as his title "Herr" indicates, but poor. His youth was spent in Vienna, at the court of Duke Frederick the Catholic. After the death of his patron in 1198, he lived the life of a wandering singer, and traveled through a great part of Germany and the countries adjoining. He was not only with the Babenberg princes in Austria, whither he subsequently returned, but also at the courts of Thuringia, Meissen, Bavaria, and Carinthia; and in turn was with the emperors Philip of Swabia, Otto IV., and Frederick II. By the last-named he was given a fief, it is supposed in Würzburg. His career as a poet began about 1187; the last poem which can be dated is a song in encouragement of the Crusade of Frederick II. in 1227. His poems are love-songs, political songs or "Sprüche," and religious songs, the last written in his later years. He is the principal minnesinger and the greatest lyric poet of medieval Germany. His poems have been often published; a late edition is that of Hermann Paul (Halle, 1882).

Wandering Jew. A legendary character who, according to one version (that of Matthew Paris, dating from the 13th century), was a servant of Pilate, by name Cartaphilus (afterward baptized Joseph), and gave Christ a blow when he was led out of the palace to execution. According to a later version he was a cobbler, named Ahasuerus, who refused Christ permission to sit down and rest when he passed his house on the way to Golgotha. Both legends agree in the sentence pronounced by Christ on the offender, "Thou shalt wander on the earth till I return." A prey to remorse, he has since wandered from land to land without being able to find a grave. There are many later versions, and the story has been turned to account by numerous painters and novelists. He is introduced in Edgar Quinet's "Ahasuerus," and by Chamisso, A. W. Schlegel, Lenau, H. C. Andersen, George Croly (in his novel "Salathiel"), Eugène Sue (in his novel "Le Juif Errant"), and others. He is reported to have appeared in different cities and countries at intervals: the last noted was in England in 1830. Gustave Doré illustrated the story in a series of woodcuts of great originality. There is also an older Italian story of a Jew, named Machus, who struck Christ with an iron glove, and was condemned to whirl ceaselessly round an underground pillar till the last day.

Wandering Jew, The. [F. Le Juif Errant.] A novel by Eugène Sue, published in 1844-45.

Wars of the Roses. In English history, the prolonged armed struggle between the rival houses of Lancaster and York (see York, House of); so called from the red rose and white rose, badges respectively of the adherents of the two families. The wars began in the reign of Henry VI. (third of the Lancaster line). The following are the leading events and incidents: Yorkist victory at St. Albans under Richard, duke of York, May 22, 1455; renewal of the war in 1459, and Yorkist victory at Elore Heath, Sept. 23; Yorkist victory at Northampton, July 10, 1460; Lancastrian victory at Wakefield, and death of the Duke of York, Dec. 31, 1460; Yorkist victory at Mortimer's Cross, Feb. 2, 1461; Lancastrian victory at St. Albans, Feb. 17, 1461; accession of the Earl of March (son of the Duke of York) as Edward IV., March, 1461; Yorkist victory at Towton, March 29, 1461; Yorkist victories at Hedgeley Moor, April 25, and Hexham, May 8, 1464; revolt of the Earl of Warwick (the "King-Maker"), 1469; restoration of Henry VI., 1470; landing of Edward IV., March 14, 1471, and his victory over Warwick at Barnet, April 14, 1471, and over Margaret of Anjou at Tewkesbury, May 4, 1471; accession of Edward V., 1483; accession of Richard III., 1483. The contest was ended with the defeat and death of Richard III. at Bosworth, Aug. 22, 1485, and the succession of Henry VII., representative of a Lancastrian offshoot, who, by his marriage with a Yorkist princess, united the conflicting interests.

Warta (vâr'tâ). The Polish name of the Warthe.

Wartburg (vârt'bôrg). An ancient princely residence at Eisenach, Germany, still occasionally occupied by the Grand Duke of Weimar. It is one of the finest existing Romanesque secular monuments, and has been well restored and adorned with historical frescos. It includes the Vorburg, or outer ward, and the Hofburg, in which are the finest buildings. Especially interesting are the Minstrel's Hall in the Landgrafenhans, the chapel, and the armory. In the Ritterhaus of the Vorburg Luther had asylum given him by the elector Frederick the Wise in 1521-22; his room and its furniture are preserved.

Wartburg, Contest of. A historic-legendary contest of minnesingers at the Wartburg, about 1206. It gave rise to an epic poem composed about 1300 ("Krieg von Wartburg").

Wartburg, Festival of. A commemorative festival, under the auspices of the German students, held at the Wartburg, Oct. 18, 1817, the fourth anniversary of the battle of Leipsic, to celebrate the tercentenary of the Reformation. Its main practical object was the foundation of the union of German students in the interest of political liberty and national unity. The event caused reactionary measures to be taken in Germany.

Warthe, or Warte (vâr'te), Pol. Warta (vâr'tâ). The largest tributary of the Oder. It rises in the southwestern part of Russian Poland, traverses Poland and the province of Posen in Prussia, and joins the Oder at Küstrin in Brandenburg. Length, over 400 miles; navigable from Konin in Poland.

Warwick (wôr'ik), or Warwickshire (wôr'ik-shir). A county of England, bounded by Stafford, Leicester, Northampton, Oxford, Gloucester, and Worcester. It contains the forest of Arden and the towns of Birmingham, Stratford-on-Avon, and Coventry. It formed a part of the ancient Mercia. Area, 875 square miles. Population (1891), 805,072.

Warwick. The capital of Warwickshire, situated on the Avon in lat. 52° 16' N., long. 1° 35' W. It contains a famous castle, with machicolated towers and battlemented walls, the effect of which is much enhanced by their framing of splendid trees. The great Caesar's Tower dates back almost to the Conquest. The spacious residential buildings are of the 15th century and later, extensively restored; they contain many historical relics, paintings, and other works of art, among them the large sculptured Warwick vase, found in Hadrian's villa at Tivoli. St. Mary's is a large Perpendicular church, in great part rebuilt in 1694. The interior is impressive, and contains interesting brasses and other medieval monuments. The church is chiefly notable for the superb Beauchamp Chapel, dating from 1364. The architecture of the chapel is florid Perpendicular, and it contains the beautifully sculptured tombs of the earls of Warwick and of Robert Dudley, earl of Leicester. Warwick was a British settlement, and became a Roman fortress about 50 A. D. It was rebuilt by Ethelreda about 915. Population (1891), 11,905.

Warwick, Earl of (Richard Nevil or Neville). Born about 1428; killed at the battle of Barnet, April 14, 1471. An English politician and commander; called "the King-Maker." He was related to both the Yorkist and the Lancastrian families. He inherited the title of earl of Salisbury and became earl of Warwick through his marriage with the daughter of Richard Beauchamp (earl of Warwick). At first he sided with the Yorkists, and served at the first battle of St. Albans in 1455; was made governor of Calais; again joined the Yorkists in 1459; defeated the Lancastrians at Northampton in July, 1460, and took Henry VI. prisoner; was defeated at St. Albans in 1461 by Margaret; joined with Edward IV. and reentered London in 1461; won with Edward the victory of Towton in 1461; was made warden of the Scottish marches, constable of Dover, lord high chamberlain, etc.; and repressed the Lancastrian rising in 1463-64. He opposed the marriage of Edward IV. with Elizabeth Woodville, and the alliance with Burgundy; and was driven into revolt by the king, whom he took prisoner in 1469, but soon released. He conspired with his son-in-law Clarence against Edward IV. in 1470; fled to France; adopted the cause of the Lancastrians; landed in England, drove Edward IV. to Flanders, and restored Henry VI. in 1470; but was overthrown by Edward IV. at Barnet in 1471.

He studied law at Harvard; was admitted to the bar in 1840; was a Whig and later a Republican member of Congress from Illinois 1853-69; and was chairman of the committee on commerce. He was secretary of state March 5-17, 1869, and United States minister to France 1869-77. He was the only foreign representative who remained in Paris through both the siege and the Commune period. He wrote "Recollections of a Minister to France" (1887).

Washburne Mountains. A group of mountains in the Yellowstone National Park. Highest point, 10,345 feet.

Washington (wosh'ing-ton). One of the Pacific States of the United States of America, extending from lat. 45° 40' to 49° N., and from long. 117° to 124° 44' W. Capital, Olympia; chief cities, Seattle and Tacoma. It is bounded by the Strait of Juan de Fuca and British Columbia on the north, Idaho on the east, Oregon (partly separated by the Columbia River) on the south, and the Pacific on the west. The Cascade Mountains traverse the State from south to north. It has rich forests, particularly in the west, and extensive deposits of coal and iron; and gold and silver are found. There is an extensive wheat region in the east. The salmon-fisheries are important, and ship-building is a flourishing industry. Washington has 36 counties, sends 2 senators and 3 representatives to Congress, and has 5 electoral votes. The Strait of Juan de Fuca was discovered in 1592, and explored in 1791; the mouth of the Columbia was explored by the American captain Gray in 1792; and further explorations were conducted by Lewis and Clark in 1805. A settlement at the mouth of the Columbia was founded by John Jacob Astor in 1811. The boundary was settled with Great Britain in 1846. Washington formed part of the Territory of Oregon, was organized as a Territory in 1853; and was admitted to the Union in 1889. Area, 69,180 square miles. Population (1900), 518,103.

Washington. The capital of the United States, forming part of the District of Columbia, situated on the Potomac, at the head of navigation, in lat. 38° 53' N., long. 77° 1' W. It has become a favorite city of residence in late years, and is noted for its public buildings, the most important being the Capitol (which see). The White House, the official residence of the President, is a handsome mansion in the English Renaissance style, with a projecting colonnade and pedimented porch on the entrance front, and a large semicircular projecting bay on the garden front, opposite. Its classical details are sober and well designed, both outside and inside, but it has become too small for the official and social needs of the chief of the government. The corner-stone of the White House was laid by General Washington, and it was first occupied in 1800 by John Adams. Besides the buildings for the various government departments, the National Museum, Smithsonian Institution, etc., are notable. The Washington monument is an obelisk-shaped tower of white marble, erected in honor of George Washington. It is 555 feet high to its acutely pointed apex, and 55 feet square at the base. The corner-stone was laid on July 4, 1848, but after a short time the work languished and then stopped entirely, until in 1876 Congress voted the completion of the monument, which was accomplished in 1884. The site for the capital was chosen in 1790, and the government removed from Philadelphia in 1800. The public buildings were burned by the British in 1814. The city was the Federal military headquarters in the Civil War, and was threatened by the Confederates under Early in 1864. Its municipal government was abolished in 1871, and a territorial government established in that year. This was abolished in 1874, and the present form instituted (see District of Columbia). Population (1900), 278,718.

Washington. The capital of Daviess County, Indiana, 92 miles southwest of Indianapolis. Population (1900), 8,551.

Washington. A seaport, capital of Beaufort County, North Carolina, situated on Pamlico River 100 miles east by south of Raleigh. Population (1900), 4,842.

Washington. The capital of Fayette County, Ohio, 35 miles southwest of Columbus. Population (1900), 5,751.

Washington. The capital of Washington County, Pennsylvania, situated on Chartiers Creek 24 miles southwest of Pittsburg. Population (1900), 7,670.

Washington, Bushrod. Born in Westmoreland County, Va., 1762; died at Philadelphia, 1829. An American jurist, nephew of George Washington. He was a member of the Virginia House of Delegates, and of the Virginia ratifying convention of 1788; and was associate justice of the United States Supreme Court 1798-1829.

Washington, George. Born in Westmoreland County, Va., Feb. 22 (O. S. Feb. 11), 1732; died at Mount Vernon, Dec. 14, 1799. A famous American soldier and statesman, the first President of the United States. He was the son of Augustine Washington, a Virginia planter. He was at school until he was about 16 years of age; was engaged in surveying 1748-51; was appointed adjutant of Virginia troops in 1751; inherited Mount Vernon on the death of his brother in 1752; was made by Dinwiddie commander of a military district of Virginia in 1753; was sent on a mission to the French authorities beyond the Allegheny River 1753-54; was appointed lieutenant-colonel in 1754; had a successful skirmish with the French, and defended Fort Mifflin, but was obliged to surrender on July 3; was a volunteer aide-de-camp to Braddock in the battle of the Monongahela in 1755, and brought off the Virginians; commanded on the frontier 1755-57; and led the advance guard in Forbes's expedition for the reduction of Fort Duquesne in 1758. On Jan. 9, 1759, he married Martha Custis (widow of Daniel Parke Custis), and settled as a planter at Mount Vernon. He was a delegate to the Virginia House of Burgesses, and to the Continental Congresses of 1774 and 1775; was appointed commander-in-chief of the Continental forces June 15, 1775; arrived at Cambridge July 2, and took command; and compelled the evacuation of Boston on March 17, 1776. His army was defeated at the battle of Long Island Aug. 27, 1776, and at White Plains Oct. 28, 1776; he retreated through New Jersey; surprised the Hessians at Trenton Dec. 26; won the victory of Princeton Jan., 1777; was defeated at Brandywine and Germantown in 1777; was at Valley Forge during the winter of 1777-78; fought the drawn battle of Monmouth in 1778; compelled the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown in 1781; resigned his commission as commander-in-chief at Annapolis in 1783; and retired to Mount Vernon. In 1787 he was president of the Constitutional Convention; was unanimously elected President of the United States in Feb., 1789, and inaugurated at New York April 30, 1789; and was unanimously reelected in 1793, serving until 1797. Among the chief events in his administration were the establishment of the machinery of government, the crystallization of parties, the regulation of commerce and finance, the admission of Vermont, Kentucky, and Tennessee, the Indian wars, the "whisky insurrection," and the Jay treaty. He issued his farewell address to the people in Sept., 1796. He was appointed lieutenant-general and commander-in-chief of the army in anticipation of a war with France in 1798.

In civil as in military life, he [Washington] was pre-eminent among his contemporaries for the clearness and soundness of his judgment, for his perfect moderation and self-control, for the quiet dignity and the indomitable firmness with which he pursued every path which he had deliberately chosen. Of all the great men in history he was the most invariably judicious, and there is scarcely a rash word or action or judgment recorded of him. Those who knew him well, noticed that he had keen sensibilities and strong passions; but his power of self-command never failed him, and no act of his public life can be traced to personal caprice, ambition, or resentment. In the dependency of long-continued failure, in the elation of sudden success, at times when his soldiers were deserting by hundreds, and when malignant plots were formed against his reputation, amid the constant quarrels, rivalries, and jealousies of his subordinates, in the dark hour of national ingratitude, and in the midst of the most universal and intoxicating flattery, he was always the same calm, wise, just, and single-minded man, pursuing the course which he believed to be right, without fear or favour or fanaticism, equally free from the passions that spring from interest, and from the passions that spring from imagination. He never acted on the impulse of an absorbing or uncalculating enthusiasm, and he valued very highly fortune, position, and reputation; but at the command of duty he was ready to risk and sacrifice them all. He was in the highest sense of the words a gentleman and a man of honour, and he carried into public life the severest standard of private morals. It was at first the constant dread of large sections of the American people that if the old Government were overthrown, they would fall into the hands of military adventurers, and undergo the yoke of military despotism. It was mainly the transparent integrity of the character of Washington that dispelled the fear. Lecky, England in the XVIIIth Century, III. 470-471.

Wells (welz). A town in the county of Somerset, England, situated at the foot of the Mendip Hills, 17 miles southwest of Bath. It is the seat of a bishopric, now conjoined with that of Bath. The cathedral is in the main of the first half of the 13th century, with square central tower and Lady chapel of the 14th. The plan shows square chevet and single transepts. The wide west front, flanked by two towers, is somewhat of the character of that of Salisbury in its superposed and monotonous tiers of arching; it is more like cabinet-work than architecture, but the details are beautiful. The interior is impressive in general effect, but is architecturally inorganic, having no vaulting-shafts in the nave. The western transept-pier, showing weakness, were buttressed in 1338 by the insertion between them of a pair of massive arches, apex to apex—a curious device. The beautiful choir is separated from the nave by a perpendicular screen, and its wall-spaces are arcaded. The Lady chapel is famous for lightness and beauty. The dimensions of the cathedral are 383 by 82 feet; the height of the vaulting, from 67 to 73. There is a beautiful octagonal chapter-house with central pillar, perpendicular cloisters, and a picturesque 13th-century bishop's palace. Population (1891), 4,822.

Wells, David Ames. Born at Springfield, Mass., June 17, 1828; died at Norwich, Conn., Nov. 5, 1898. A noted American economist. He graduated at Williams College in 1847, and at the Lawrence Scientific School, Harvard, in 1851. In 1865-66 he was United States commissioner of revenue; served on other important commissions; and took a leading part in financial and economic discussions. He was an able advocate of freedom of trade. He wrote "Science of Common Things" (1856), text-books on natural philosophy, geology, and chemistry, government reports, "Our Merchant Marine" (1882), "Primer of Tariff Reform" (1884), "Practical Economics" (1885), "Study of Mexico" (1886), "Relation of the Tariff to Wages" (1888), and various other economic works.

Welsch Tyrol. See Tyrol, Welsch.

Welser (vel'ser), Bartholomew. Died at Augsburg, 1559. A German banker. He was the head of one of the richest banking and commercial firms of his time; lent large sums to Charles V.; was created a prince of the Empire; and in 1527 was granted the right to conquer and colonize Venezuela. Dalfinger, Speier, and others were engaged by the Welsers in this enterprise, which was carried on simply as a commercial venture. Great numbers of the Indians were enslaved, and far more were killed. The charter was revoked in 1546, after the Welsers had lost, it is said, 3,000,000 florins.

Welsh (welsh). The people of Wales, or the members of the Cymric race indigenous to Wales. They were ruled by petty princes and maintained their independence of the English till 1282-83.

Welshpool (welsh'pöl). A town in the county of Montgomery, Wales, situated on the Severn 17 miles west of Shrewsbury. Near it is Powys Castle. Population (1891), 6,306.

Welsh Shakspeare, The. See Williams, Edward.
Welwitsch (wel'wich), Friedrich. Born at Mariasal, Austria, 1807; died at London, Oct. 20, 1872. An African botanist and explorer. He spent seven years in Angola, West Africa (1853-61); collected above 40,000 botanic specimens; and discovered, in 1863, near Mossamedes, the singular plant named, after him, Welwitschia mirabilis.

Wemmick (wen'ik), John. A kind-hearted but apparently flinty little clerk in Dickens's "Great Expectations." He has a little home at Walworth, which looks like a battery with mounted guns, where he devotes himself to his dead old father, whom he calls "Aged P."

Wenceslaus (wen'ses-lās), or Wenceslas (wen'ses-las), G. Wenzel (vent'sel), Saint. Duke of Bohemia about 928-936, a patron saint of Bohemia.

Wenceslaus I. King of Bohemia 1230-53, son of Ottokar I. He was a patron of the poetic art, and himself a minnesinger.

Wenceslaus II. King of Bohemia 1278-1305, son of Ottokar II. He extended the Bohemian power, and was crowned king of Poland in 1300.

Wenceslaus. Born 1361; died Aug. 16, 1419. German king, son of the emperor Charles IV. He was elected king of the Romans in 1376, and succeeded to the German and Bohemian thrones in 1378. He put to death John of Nepomuk. He was imprisoned by Bohemian nobles 1393-94; was deposed from the German throne in 1400; and renounced his right to that crown in 1410, but continued to reign as king of Bohemia.

Wendland (vent'lānt). The northeastern part of the former principality of Lüneburg in Prussia.

Wends (wendz). 1. A name given in early times by the Germans to their Slavic neighbors. — 2. The members of a branch of the Slavic race living in Lusatia. Also called Sorbs.

Wenern (vä'nern), or Venern (vä'nern), Lake. The largest lake of Sweden, and after Lakes Ladoga and Onega the largest lake in Europe, situated in the southern part of Sweden, west-northwest of Lake Wettern, with which it is connected by a canal (and thence with the Baltic). It receives the Klar Elf, and its outlet is by the Göta Elf into the Cattegat. Length, 100 miles. Width, 50 miles. Height above sea-level, 140 feet. Area, about 2,290 square miles.

Wengern Alp (ven'gern älp). A height in the pass of the Little Scheideck, Bernese Oberland, Switzerland; famous for its magnificent view.

Wenlock (wen'lok), or Much Wenlock (muh wen'lok). A town in Shropshire, England, 30 miles west-northwest of Birmingham. Population (1891), 15,703.

Wenrorono (wen-rō-rō'nō). A tribe of North American Indians which, when first known, lived in association with the Neuters, and, upon the attacks of the Iroquois in 1638, fled to the Hurons with whom they became mixed. See Iroquoian.

Wentworth (went'wörth), Benning. Born at Portsmouth, N. H., 1696; died 1770. A royal governor of New Hampshire 1741-67. He made grants of land (the New Hampshire grants) in southern Vermont.

Wentworth, Charles Watson, second Marquis of Rockingham. Born 1730; died July 1, 1782. An English statesman, prime minister 1765-66 and March-July, 1782.

Wentworth, Sir John. Born at Portsmouth, N. H., Aug. 9, 1737; died at Halifax, N. S., April 8, 1820. Royal governor of New Hampshire 1767-75. He was a loyalist in the Revolution, and was lieutenant-governor of Nova Scotia 1792-1808.

Wentworth, Thomas, Earl of Strafford. Born at London, April 13, 1593; executed at London, May 12, 1641. A famous English statesman. He entered Parliament in 1614; and was an opponent of the policy of James I., and until 1628-29 of that of Charles I. In 1628 he was raised to the peerage; became president of the Council of the North in 1628; was made a privy councillor in 1629; was appointed lord deputy of Ireland 1632, and arrived there 1633; and became the chief adviser of Charles I. In 1640 he was made earl of Strafford and lord lieutenant of Ireland; commanded the army against the Scots in that year; was impeached by the Long Parliament; and was condemned by a bill of attainder.

He was accused on twenty-eight counts which concerned his conduct towards England, Ireland, and Scotland. The chief was that he had incensed his majesty against the members of the late Parliament telling him "they had denied to supply him, and that his majesty having tried the affections of his people, and been refused, he was absolved from all rules of government, and that he had an army in Ireland which he might employ to reduce this kingdom" (State Trials). The Lords refused to admit as evidence a paper found by Sir Harry Vane which supported his father's evidence on this charge. For which cause the Commons brought in a bill of attainder.

Aeland and Rausone.

Wenzel. See Wenceslaus.

Werelä, Peace of. A treaty concluded in 1790, between Sweden and Russia, at Werelä, a village in the government of Nyland, Finland.

Wergeland (ver'ge-länd), Henrik Arnold Thaulow. Born at Christiansand, June 17, 1808; died at Christiania, July 12, 1845. A Norwegian poet.

His father was a clergyman, and one of the members of the Constitutional Convention at Eidsvoll, and pastor there after 1817. He studied at the Christiania University after 1825, and began to write in 1827. His first productions were a series of satirical farces (among them "Ah! Om Smag og Behag kan man ikke disputere" ("There is no disputing about taste") and "Fapegojen" ("The Parrot"), all published under the pseudonym Sifid Sifada. In 1828 appeared the tragedy "Sinclair's Død" ("Sinclair's Death"). In 1829 was published a volume of lyrics, many of them enthusiastically patriotic in character, which were taken up as songs by the people; and at this time his fame as a poet really began. In 1830 appeared the long dramatic poem "Skabelsen, Menesket og Messias" ("The Creation, Man and Messiah"). Subsequent works were the drama "Opium" (1831) and the poem "Spaniolen" (1833). In the meantime the poet Wergeland had made in a pamphlet, in 1832, a personal attack upon him for his sin of poetical commission; and in 1834, in the poem "Norway's Twilight," had censured the misplaced zeal of the ultra-national faction which Wergeland represented. At the production of his drama "Campbellerne" ("The Campbells") the feud came to an open outbreak in the theater. Subsequently his fortunes steadily declined. He was deprived by the king of an official position, and then became involved in a lawsuit which took the greater part of his property. Some of his best work, however, was done after this time. Particularly to be mentioned are "Jan van Huysums Blomsterstykke" ("Jan van Huysum's Flower-piece"), a series of lyrics; the poem "Swalen" ("The Swallow"); the lyrics "Juden" ("The Jew") and "Jodinden" ("The Jewess"); and, finally, his last and greatest poem, "Den ædelste Leds" ("The English Pilot"). His collected works were published at Christiania, 1852-1859, in 9 vols.

Werner (ver'ner). A tragedy by Lord Byron; so called from the name of its hero, a mysterious and morbid character. Macready produced this play in 1830, and Werner was considered one of his most powerful parts.

Of the "German's Tale" (by Harriet Lee) he [Byron] confessed: "It made a deep impression on me, and may be said to contain the germ of much that I have since written." It not only contained the germ of "Werner," but supplied the whole material for that tragedy. All the characters of the novel are re-produced by Byron except "Ida," whom he added. The plan of Miss Lee's work is exactly followed, as the poet admitted, and even the language is frequently adopted without essential change.

Tuckerman, Hist. of English Prose Fiction, p. 256.

Werner (ver'ner), Abraham Gottlob. Born at Wehrau, Upper Lusatia, Sept. 23, 1750; died at Dresden, June 30, 1817. A celebrated German mineralogist and geologist, the founder of scientific geology; instructor in the Mining Academy in Freiberg from 1775. He was the propounder of the "Neptunian theory," which regarded as of aqueous origin various formations now considered to be volcanic, and which aroused much discussion. His works include "Über die äussern Kennzeichen der Fossilien" (1774), "Kurze Klassifikation und Beschreibung der Gekirgärten" (1787), "Neue Theorie über die Entstehung der Gänge" (1791), etc.

Werner, Franz von; pseudonym Murad Effendi. Born at Vienna, May 30, 1836; died at The Hague, Sept. 12, 1881. A German poet. He was in the Turkish military and diplomatic service.

Werner, Friedrich Ludwig Zacharias. Born at Königsberg, Prussia, Nov. 18, 1768; died at Vienna, Jan. 17, 1823. A German dramatist and poet, founder of the "fate-tragedies." He was a Roman Catholic preacher in later life. Among his dramas are "Die Söhne des Thals" ("The Sons of the Valley," 1803), "Der Vierundzwanzigste Februar" (1815; "The 24th of February"), "Das Kreuz an der Ostsee" ("The Cross on the Baltic," 1806), "Martin Luther," or "Die Weihe der Kraft" (1807), etc.

Wernigerode (ver'nē-ge-rō-de). A town in the province of Saxony, Prussia, situated at the foot of the Harz, on the Holzemme, 40 miles southwest of Magdeburg. It is the capital of the county of Stolberg-Wernigerode (formerly an imperial fief). It contains a noted Rathaus and castle with a large library. Population (1890), 9,966.

Werra (ver'ra). One of the two head streams of the Weser. It rises in Saxe-Meiningen, flows through Thuringia, separating the Thuringerwald from the Rhöngebirge, and unites with the Fulda at Münden to form the Weser. Length, about 170 miles.

Werth, or Werdt (vart), Johann von (Jean de Weert). Born at the end of the 16th century; died 1652. A general in the Imperialist and Bavarian service in the Thirty Years' War. He was distinguished at Nördlingen in 1634; captured Ehrenbreitstein in 1637; was defeated and taken prisoner at Rheinfelden March 3, 1638; commanded at Tuttingen Nov. 24, 1643; and was distinguished at Mergentheim and Alerheim in 1645.

Wertingen (ver'ting-en). A small town in Swabia, Bavaria, situated on the Zusam 16 miles northwest of Augsburg. Here, Oct. 8, 1805, the French under Lannes and Murat defeated the Austrians.

Wesel (vā'zel). A city in the Rhine Province, Prussia, situated at the junction of the Lippe and Rhine, in lat. 51° 40' N., long. 6° 37' E. It is strongly fortified. In the middle ages it was a Hanseatic town and a free imperial city. Population (1890), 20,724.

Weser (vā'zer). [L. Visurgis, OG. Visuracha.] One of the principal rivers of Germany. It is formed, at Münden, by the union of the rivers Werra and Fulda; flows generally north and north-northwest, and principally through Prussia; and empties into the North Sea near Bremerhaven. Its chief tributaries are the Aller, Wümme, and Geeste (on the right), Diemel, Werre, Aue, and Hunte. On it are situated Bremen and Minden. Length, about 270 miles, or, including the head stream Werra, about 435 miles; navigable for sea vessels to Elsfleth, and for large boats to Münden.

Weser Mountains, or Weser Terrace. A mountainous and plateau region, extending on both sides of the Weser from Münden to Minden. Among the groups of mountains or hills are the Bramwald, Solling, Osterwald, Süntel, Deister, Bückeburg, the Weser proper, and the Tentoburgerwald. Highest point, about 1,650 feet.

Wesley (wes'li or wez'li), Charles. Born at Epworth, Lincolnshire, England, Dec. 28, 1708; died at London, March 29, 1788. An English Methodist clergyman and hymn-writer, brother of John Wesley; famous as a hymn-writer. He was educated at Westminister School and at Christ Church, Oxford. He accompanied his brother John to Georgia 1735-36.

Wesley, John. Born at Epworth, England, June 28 (N. S.), 1703; died at London, March 2, 1791. An English clergyman, son of Samuel Wesley; famous as the founder of Methodism. He was educated at Charterhouse School and at Christ Church, Oxford; became a fellow of Lincoln College in 1726; and was curate to his father 1727-29. In the latter year he settled at Oxford, where he became the leader of a band of young men conspicuous for their religious earnestness; they were somewhat derisively called "methodists" from the regularity and strict method of their lives and studies. He went to Georgia as a missionary in 1735, returning to England in 1738. At first he was allied with the Moravians, but soon abandoned all ecclesiastical traditions and established the Methodist Church. In 1739 he began open-air preaching. The first Methodist conference was held in 1744. His literary work, also, was extensive.

Wesleyan (wes'li-an or wez'li-an) University. An institution of learning at Middletown, Connecticut, chartered in 1831. It is under Methodist Episcopal control. It has about 35 instructors and 350 students.

Wessel (ves'sel), Johan Herman. Born in the parish of Vestby, Norway, 1742; died at Copenhagen, 1785. A Danish dramatist and poet. His father was a clergyman. After elementary instruction in Christiania, he went in 1761 to the Copenhagen University, where he studied the succeeding year. Subsequently he supported himself by teaching modern languages. In 1778 he was made translator to the Royal Theater. His one important literary work, written when he was 30 years old, is the tragedy "Kjærlighed uden Strømper" ("Love without Stockings"), a parody on the French tragedies then in vogue on the Danish stage, from which it effectually banished them. Two other dramas are of but little value. He wrote, besides, a few lyrics and humorous narratives in verse. His poems were published in a second edition at Copenhagen in 1878.

Wessex (wes'seks). [ME. Wessex, Wessex, AS. Wessex, West Saxons. Cf. Essex, Sussex.] One of the Saxon kingdoms in England, which became the nucleus of the kingdom of England. The settlement of the West Saxons under Cerdic and Cynric on the coast of Hampshire took place in 495, and the kingdom spread north and west to Berkshire, Wiltshire, Dorset, etc. Wessex obtained the overlordship in Britain under Egbert in the first part of the 9th century; was reduced in power by the Danes; and under Alfred's successors developed into the kingdom of England. It was an earldom in the 10th and 11th centuries, comprising the territory south of the Thames.

Wessobrunner Gebet. ['Wessobrunn Prayer.'] An important relic of Old High German literature, dating from the end of the 8th century. It was preserved in the Benedictine monastery of Wessobrunn, in Bavaria near the Lech.

West (west), Benjamin. Born at Springfield, Chester County, Pa., Oct. 10, 1738; died at London, March 11, 1820. An American-English historical and portrait painter. He worked as a portrait-painter in Philadelphia and New York, and studied in Italy 1760-63. He settled in London in 1763; became court historical painter in 1772; was one of the early members of the Royal Academy; and was the successor of Reynolds as president of the Royal Academy. Among his noted paintings are "The Death of Wolfe" (at Grosvenor House), "Battle of La Hogue," "Christ Healing the Sick" (National Gallery, London), "Death on the Pale Horse" (Pennsylvania Academy), "Alexander the Great and his Physicians," and "Penn's Treaty with the Indians." Many of his pictures are at Hampton Court.

Western (wes'tern), Sophia. The heroine of Fielding's novel "Tom Jones," a very bright and attractive character. After various adventures caused by her father's brutal temper, she is reconciled to him and marries Jones.

Western, Squire. In Fielding's novel "Tom Jones," a hunting squire of gross speech and ungoverned and brutal temper, the father of the fair Sophia. His redeeming trait is his affection for his daughter, whom, however, he treats in a most tyrannical fashion.

But, above all, what shall we say of Squire Western, next to Falstaff the most universally popular of comic creations? . . . His shrewdness, his avarice, his coarse kindness, his sense-defying Jacobitism, his irresistible unreasonableness; his brutal anger, making the page which chronicles it shake with oaths, interjections, and screaming interrogations;—loving his daughter as he loves his dogs and horses, and willing to use the whip and the spur the moment she does not obey him with due alacrity, as in the case of his other brutes; and loving himself with a depth of affection, with a disregard of everything else on and over the earth, which touches the pathetic in selfishness. Whipple, Essays and Reviews.

Western Australia (wes'tern ās-trā'liā). A state of Australia, bounded by the ocean on the north, west, and south, and by South Australia (with the Northern Territory and Alexander Land) on the east. Capital, Perth. The interior is largely a desert, and is to a great extent unexplored. The largest export is wool. The government is vested in a governor, legislative council (elected since 1893), and legislative assembly. The coasts were visited in the 16th century; a convict settlement was established at King George's Sound in 1825; and free settlements were founded on Swan River about 1829. Area, 975,920 square miles. Population (1899), estimated, 168,480.

Western Empire, The. The distinctive designation of the western portion of the Roman world after its division into two independent empires in A. D. 395. See Eastern Empire. West Indian, The. A comedy by Richard Cumberland (1770). It is considered his best play. Garrick brought it out in 1771.

West Indies (in'diz). [Formerly West Indias; G. West Indien, F. Antilles, Sp. Antillas or Indias Occidentales.] An archipelago between North and South America, extending in a curve from Florida to the peninsula of Paria, and separating the Caribbean Sea from the Atlantic Ocean and the Gulf of Mexico. The principal groups distinguished are the Greater Antilles (Cuba, Haiti, Porto Rico, and Jamaica); the Bahamas, north of Cuba; and the Lesser Antilles, or Caribbean Islands, forming a line at the southeastern extremity of the group. Most of the Bahamas are low. Nearly all the other islands are mountainous, and in the Lesser Antilles there are many active and extinct volcanoes. With the exception of some of the Bahamas, the entire group lies within the tropics, and the climate and productions of all are essentially tropical. The principal products are sugar, tobacco, and coffee. Nearly all the islands are occasionally visited by hurricanes, which are sometimes very destructive: the hurricane months are from June to October inclusive. Columbus discovered the Bahamas, Cuba, and Haiti in 1492, and nearly all the islands were known before the continent of America was discovered. They were supposed to be outlying islands of India or Asia, and, as they had been found by sailing westward, they were called the West Indies. Later the name included for a time the known portions of the continent. The Greater Antilles were colonized by the Spanish, who claimed the whole group; but later many of the smaller islands were seized by French, English, and Dutch adventurers, and their wars with one another and with the Spaniards were continued intermittently until 1815, the smaller colonies frequently changing masters. Many African slaves were brought in, and their descendants form a large proportion of the population. In 1898 Cuba was freed from the domination of Spain, and Porto Rico passed to the United States; Haiti is divided between two independent states; Jamaica, the Bahamas, and some of the Lesser Antilles belong to England; and the rest are divided between France, Denmark, and the Netherlands.

Westmacott (west'ma-kot), Sir Richard. Born at London, 1775; died Sept. 1, 1856. An English sculptor. In 1793 he was a pupil of Canova at Rome. In 1827 he succeeded Flaxman as professor of sculpture at the Royal Academy. Executed monuments in St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey. His statues include those of Fox, the dukes of York and Bedford, George III., Achilles, etc.

Westmeath (west'mēth). A county in Leinster, Ireland, bounded by Cavan, Meath, King's County, Roscommon, and Longford. Area, 708 square miles. Population (1891), 65,109.

Westminster (west'min-ster). A former city, now a borough (municipal) of London. It is bounded by Marylebone on the north, Temple Bar on the east, the Thames on the east and south, and Kensington and Chelsea on the west. It is noted for the abbey, around which it grew up, and for the houses of Parliament and government buildings.

Westminster, Provisions of. Ordinances passed through the influence of five barons in Parliament at Westminster, 1259. "They embodied the grievances of the barons stated at Oxford, and mainly concerned the administration of justice and local government by the sheriffs."

Westminster Abbey. A famous church in Westminster, London, founded on the site of an earlier church by Edward the Confessor, and rebuilt in the 13th century by Henry III. and Edward I. The highly ornate chapel of Henry VII., at the east end, was added by that king in the early 16th century. The dimensions, including the chapel, are 513 by 75 feet; length of transepts, 200; height of vaulting, 102. The inconspicuous square west towers were designed by Sir Christopher Wren. The north transept facade is very fine; it has 3 handsome portals, a graceful arcade, and a large wheel. The interior is extremely impressive, the proportions and the details being good; the triforium is of especial beauty. The handsome reredos, of red and white alabaster, is modern, as are the choir-stalls. Henry VII.'s chapel has nave and aisles, and 5 radiating chapels in the chevet; it is a notable example of florid Perpendicular, especially remarkable for the fan-tracery and pendants of its ceiling. Its rich stalls are appropriated to the knights and squires of the Bath; over each are suspended a sword and a banner. The abbey is world-famous as the chief burial-place of Great Britain's distinguished men; comparatively few of the monuments are artistically interesting. The south transept constitutes the famous Poets' Corner; it contains memorials to a large number of the names honored in English literature. The choir-chapels contain medieval and Renaissance monuments of higher intrinsic interest, especially Henry VII.'s chapel: the superb monument of that king, in metal, by Torregiano, is enclosed in a rich Perpendicular chantry of brass. Several other kings and princes are buried in this chapel, and in that of Edward the Confessor, which occupies the extremity of the choir. The Early English chapter-house is octagonal, with central column. The fine cloisters also contain tombs.

Westminster Assembly, or Assembly of Divines at Westminster. A convocation summoned by the Long Parliament to advise "for the settling of the liturgy and the government of the Church of England." Most of its members were Presbyterians, and nearly all were Calvinists. It met July 1, 1643, and continued its sessions until Feb. 22, 1649. The chief fruits of its labors were the Directory of Public Worship, the Confession of Faith, and the Larger and Shorter Catechisms, which were rejected in England but established in Scotland.

Westminster Bridge. The oldest bridge but one over the Thames at London. The first bridge was designed by Labeley, a Swiss architect. The original plan contemplated a wooden structure, but it was changed to stone after the "great frost" of 1739. The piers were built of solid blocks of Portland stone, on caissons which were the largest that had been constructed up to that time. It was begun in 1739 and completed in 1750. It was 1,220 feet long, 40 feet wide, 58 feet high, and the central span was 76 feet wide: there were 15 arches. In 1856-1862 it was replaced by the present stone and iron structure, consisting of 7 iron arches on granite piers, built by Page; it is 1,160 feet long and 85 feet wide.

Westminster Hall. A structure adjoining the houses of Parliament on the west, forming part of the ancient palace of Westminster. It was begun by William Rufus, burned at the end of the 13th century, and restored by Edward II. and Richard II. It has a magnificent fruited hammer-beam roof, in a single span 68 feet wide; the length is 290 and the height 92. Here sat some of the first English Parliaments; here, until George IV., the coronation festivities were held; and here Charles I. was condemned, and Cromwell saluted as Lord Protector. The hall now serves as a vestibule to the houses of Parliament. Below it on the east is the crypt of St. Stephen, or Church of St. Mary Undercroft, a vaulted pointed chapel, in architecture and decoration somewhat resembling the lower chapel of Sainte Chapelle, Paris; the rich cloisters were built by Henry VIII.

Westminster Palace. 1. The houses of Parliament.—2. A former royal residence in Westminster. A palace is supposed to have existed at Westminster in the reign of Canute (1017-35). Its importance, however, begins with Edward the Confessor (1042-66). Various additions were made by his successors until Henry III. (1216-72), in whose reign work was constantly in progress. His palace was richly decorated with pictures in oil-color—according to Horace Walpole the first recorded use of that medium. It was repeatedly visited by fire, and in 1542 (reign of Henry VIII.) all the living-apartments were destroyed. It was then abandoned by royalty, and not used again until July 18, 1821, when George IV. spent the night before his coronation there. The entire palace, except Westminster Hall, was burned in 1834.

Westminster School. A noted preparatory school at Westminster. It was established in the abbey by Henry VIII., and was reestablished by Elizabeth.

An outbreak in the four western counties of Pennsylvania, in 1794, against the enforcement of an act of Congress of 1791 imposing an excise duty on all spirits distilled within the United States, and on stills. A large body of militia, under Governor Lee of Virginia, was sent by Washington to the disturbed district, but the insurrection was suppressed without bloodshed.

Whisky Ring. A conspiracy of distillers and United States government officials, formed to defraud the government of the excise taxes. It existed about 1872-75.

Whistlecraft (hwis'l-kraft), William and Robert. A pseudonym of John Hookham Frere. He wrote a "Prospectus and Specimen of an intended National Work, by William and Robert Whistlecraft, of Stowmarket, in Suffolk, Harness and Collar Makers, intended to comprise the most interesting Particulars relating to King Arthur and his Round Table." In this work he introduced the beresque style into the English language. Byron, when sending "Beppo" to his publisher, writes: "I have written a poem humorous, in or after the excellent manner of Mr. Whistlecraft, and founded on a Venetian anecdote which amused me. . . . Whistlecraft is my immediate model, but Berni is the father of that kind of writing; which, I think, suits our language, too, very well."

Whistler (hwis'ler), James Abbott McNeill. Born at Lowell, Mass., 1834: died at London, July 17, 1903. A distinguished American painter and etcher. He attended the West Point Academy 1851-54, and later studied art in Paris under Gleyre. He removed to London in 1863, and in 1886 was elected president of the Society of British Artists. He is especially noted for his etchings. He wrote "New Theory of the Earth" (1696), "Primitive Christianity Revived" (1711), "St. Clement's and St. Irenaeus's Vindication of the Apostolical Constitutions" (1716), "Sir Isaac Newton's Mathematical Philosophy Demonstrated" (1716), works on mathematics, Arianism, prophecy, the Scriptures, a life of Samuel Clarke, autobiography (1749-50), and a translation of Josephus (1737).

Whitby (hwit'bi). A seaport and watering-place in Yorkshire, England, situated at the mouth of the Esk in the North Sea, in lat. 54° 29' N., long. 0° 37' W.: the Saxon Streonshalh. It has manufactures of jet ornaments and important fisheries and trade; and was formerly noted for ship-building. It is a fashionable seaside resort. The famous abbey was founded in the 7th century, though the existing remains date from between the 12th and the 14th. The ruins of the church are picturesque and architecturally interesting. The clearstory windows are small, but the other openings are of good size. The town grew up around the monastery. Population (1891), 13,274.

Whitby. The capital of Ontario County, Ontario, Canada, situated on Lake Ontario 30 miles east-northeast of Toronto. Population (1901), 2,110.

Whitby, Daniel. Born at Rushden, Northamptonshire, 1638; died at Salisbury, March 24, 1726. An English theologian. He graduated at Trinity College, Oxford, in 1657. In 1672 he was rector at St. Edmunds, Salisbury. His attempt to reconcile the Anglican Church and the Dissenters excited the wrath of the clergy; his book "The Protestant Reconciler" (1683) was burned at Oxford, and he was forced to recant. He wrote controversial works against Roman Catholicism, and others relating to Arianism, Arminianism, etc.

Whitby, Synod or Council of. An ecclesiastical council held at Whitby in 664, under the leadership of Oswy, king of Northumbria, to decide the Easter and tonsure questions. It resulted in the triumph of the Roman party as against the Celtic.

White Company, The. [P. La Compagnie Blanche.] A band of assassins organized in Toulouse in the 13th century by "the ferocious Folquet," bishop of Toulouse. He marched at their head, massacring all who were suspected of favoring heretical opinions. This company joined the army of Simon de Montfort when he besieged Toulouse. The name was also assumed by a band of freebooters (the "Grand Companies") led by Bertrand du Guesclin in 1366, from the white cross which each wore on his shoulder. He was ransomed from English captivity for the purpose of ridding France of these adventurers. He placed himself at their head and led them out of the country into Spain. The name was also given, probably on account of their equipment, to another band of adventurers led by Sir John Hawkwood, who ravaged the northern part of Italy with them in the 14th century.

White Czar, or White King, The. An epithet of the Czar of Russia.

White Devil, The, or Vittoria Corombona. A tragedy by Webster, first acted in 1607 or 1608. It was printed in 1612. See Corombona.

But when these criticisms and others are made, "The White Devil" remains one of the most glorious works of the period. Vittoria is perfect throughout; and in the justly lauded trial scene she has no superior on any stage. Braechiano is a thoroughly lifelike portrait of the man who is completely besotted with an evil woman. Flaminio I have spoken of, and not favourably; yet in literature, if not in life, he is a triumph; and, above all, the absorbing tragic interest of the play, which it is impossible to take up without finishing, has to be counted in. But the real charm of "The White Devil" is the wholly misraendous poetry in phrases and short passages which it contains.

Saintsbury, Hist. of Elizabethan Lit., p. 275.

White Devil of Wallachia, The. A Turkish nickname of Scanderbeg.

White Elephant, Land of the. Siam.

Whitehall Palace. A palace in London, England, originally built by Hubert de Burgh in the reign of Henry III. It became the residence of the archbishops of York in 1248, and was called York Place for three centuries. It should not be confounded with York House. It escheated to the crown under Henry VIII. In 1615 it was nearly destroyed by fire, and James I. undertook to rebuild the palace, but only the existing banqueting-hall, designed by Inigo Jones, was finished at the opening of the civil war. The remainder of the old palace has since disappeared. The banqueting-hall is one of the best examples of the Palladian style, 111 by 55½ feet, and 65½ high. The ceiling is covered with paintings by Rubens representing the Apotheosis of James I., incidents in the life of Charles I., and allegories of Peace, Plenty, and similar subjects. Through an opening broken in the wall between the upper and the lower central windows Charles I. walked to the scaffold. The banqueting-hall was turned into a chapel by George I., but has never been consecrated. It is called "the Chapel Royal of Whitehall," and was dismantled in 1800.

Whittington (hwit'ing-ton). A town in Derbyshire, England, 9 miles south by east of Sheffield. Population (1891), 8,798.

Whittington, Sir Richard. Born about 1358; died March, 1423. Lord Mayor of London. He was a son of Sir Richard Whittington of Pauntley, Gloucestershire, who died an outlaw in 1360. In 1392 he was an alderman and sheriff of London, and was chosen mayor in 1397, 1406, and 1419. In 1416 he was elected member of Parliament for London. The old legend which depicts him as going up to London to seek his fortune, which he finally achieves by means of his cat, has no foundation in fact; but the phrase "Whittington and his cat" is supposed to be a corruption of the word acat or achat, used in the 14th century, meaning 'trading' or 'barter,' round which the nursery tale grew. There is an Eastern legend of the same nature, which probably affected the form of the story.

Whittridge (hwit'rej), Worthington. Born at Springfield, Ohio, May 22, 1820. An American landscape-painter, a pupil of Andreas Achenbach in Düsseldorf. He was elected national academieian in 1861, and president in 1874.

Wieland (vĕ'lānt), Christopher Martin. Born at Oberholzheim, near Biberach, Sept. 5, 1733; died at Weimar, Jan. 20, 1813. A German poet and author. His father was a clergyman in the Swabian village where the poet was born. In 1750 he went to Tübingen to study jurisprudence at the university. The following year (1751) appeared his first work, the philosophical-didactic poem "Die Natur der Dinge" ("The Nature of Things"). This was followed by other moral writings, among them an "Anti-Old." In 1752, at the invitation of the poet and historian Bodmer, he went to Zurich, where the next year he published the poem "Der gepriefte Abraham" ("The Trial of Abraham"). Other poems of this period are "Sympathien" ("Sympathies"), and the "Empfindungen des Christen" ("The Feelings of the Christian," 1755), directed against the Anaerontic poets. In 1759 he left Zurich to take the position of tutor at Bern. The succeeding year, however, he returned to Biberach, where he was given a minor legal position. His writings subsequently exhibit an entirely different tendency from the religious ones of the Zurich period. They are the prose romance "Araspes und Panthena" (1761); a translation in whole or in part of twenty-two of the plays of Shakspeare, between 1762 and 1766; the romance (in the manner of "Don Quixote") "Don Sylvio von Rosalva" (1761); "Königliche Erzählungen" ("Humorous Tales," 1769), the most celebrated of his novels, "Agathon" (1766-67); the narratives in verse "Musalem" and "Iridis" (both 1768). In 1769 he was made professor of philosophy and literature at the University of Erfurt, where he remained until 1772, when he went to Weimar as tutor to the young prince Charles Augustus. He subsequently lived in or near Weimar until his death. After his removal to Erfurt had appeared, further, in the same vein as the works immediately preceding, "Die Grazien" ("The Graces"), prose and verse (1770), and the narrative poem "Der neue Amadis" ("The New Amadis," 1771). With his establishment at Erfurt begins a third and more serious period in his literary work. The first production in the new direction was the prose romance "Der goldene Spiegel" ("The Golden Mirror," 1772). The following year, in Weimar, he started a quarterly literary magazine, "Der teutsche Mercur" ("The German Mercury"), which was successfully continued until 1810. In it appeared the satirical romance "Die Abderiten" ("The Abderites," 1774), and the best-known of his poems, the epic "Oberon," which was published in 1780. Among his other works may particularly be mentioned the poems "Gaudalin" (1776), "Geron der Adelige" ("Geron the Noble," 1777), and "Clea und Sinibald"; the operas "Alceste" and "Hercules"; and the sequel to "The Golden Mirror," the novel "Der Damischmend," published in 1775. His collected works were published under his own supervision, 1794-1802, in 39 vols. with 6 supplements. Subsequently his complete works were published at Leipzig, 1818-28, in 53 vols.

Wife for a Month, A. A play by Fletcher, acted some time before 1624, printed in 1647.

Wife of Bath's Tale, The. One of Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales." It is that of a hag who returns to her original form of a lovely lady when a knight is found courteous enough to marry her. The prologue owes numerous passages to Jerome's treatise against Jovinian who argued against celibacy, and was modernized by Pope. Dryden modernized the tale and changed it unwarrantably. Variants and analogues of this tale are known in Sanskrit, Turkish, Kafir, Gaelic, and Icelandic, in the Gawain division of the Arthurian cycle, and in Gower's "Florentius" ("Confessio Amantis," i.), which is no doubt from a French original.

Wigan (wig'an). A town in Lancashire, England, situated on the Douglas 18 miles north-east of Liverpool. It has coal mines, cotton manufactures, foundries, furnaces, manufactures of nails, etc. It was the scene of Parliamentary victories in 1643 and 1651. Population (1901), 60,770.

Wilberforce, Samuel. Born at Clapham, near London, Sept. 7, 1805; killed by a fall from his horse near Dorking, England, July 19, 1873. An English prelate, bishop of Winchester; third son of William Wilberforce. In 1826 he graduated at Oxford (Oriel College); in 1830 became rector of Brightstone, Isle of Wight; in 1841 was appointed chaplain to the Prince Consort; and in 1844 became bishop of Oxford. In 1868 he was appointed bishop of Winchester. Though a High-churchman, he did not join the Oxford movement; but several members of his family went over to the Church of Rome. His cleverness and persuasiveness of speech and manner gained him the nickname of "Soapy Sam," which he explained as due to the fact that he was "often in hot water, and always came out with clean hands." He published, with his brother, a life of his father (1838), and his correspondence (1840). He wrote "Note-Book of a Country Clergyman" (1832), "Agathos" (1839), "History of the Protestant Episcopal Church of America" (1841), etc.

Wilberforce, William. Born at Hull, England, Aug. 24, 1759; died at London, July 29, 1833.

An English philanthropist, statesman, and orator; famous as an opponent of the slave-trade. His family held the manor of Wilberforce in the East Riding, Yorkshire. He graduated at Cambridge (St. John's College), and in 1780 became member of Parliament for Hull. He was intimately associated with William Pitt. About 1787 he met Thomas Clarkson, and began to agitate the slavery question with the support of Pitt, who, in 1788, in the absence of Wilberforce, introduced the question in Parliament. In 1792 Wilberforce carried in the House of Commons a measure for gradual abolition, which was thrown out by the Lords. Immediate abolition was secured in 1807. The Emancipation Bill was passed in 1833, a month after the death of Wilberforce. He wrote "A Practical View of the Prevailing Religious System of Professed Christians" (1797), etc.

Wilkes, John. Born at London, Oct. 17, 1727; died there, Dec., 1797. An English politician, publicist, and political agitator. He was educated at the University of Leyden; entered Parliament in 1757; and established the "North Briton" in 1762, in which he attacked the Bute ministry. For his No. 45, criticizing George III. (1763), he was imprisoned, but was soon released, and became a popular hero. A scandalous "Essay on Woman," printed for private circulation, was seized, and Wilkes was expelled from Parliament (1764). He went to France; was tried in his absence; and was outlawed for non-appearance. In 1768 he returned, and was elected for Middlesex; was imprisoned; and was expelled from Parliament (1769). He was several times reelected, but each time declared ineligible. In 1770 he was released and elected alderman of London. In 1771 he became sheriff, and in 1774 lord mayor. In the same year he was again elected to Parliament and allowed to take his seat, remaining a member until 1790. The resolutions invalidating his former elections were expunged in 1782.

Wilkes-Barre (wilks'bar-e). The capital of Luzerne County, Pennsylvania, situated in the valley of Wyoming, on the North Branch of the Susquehanna, 97 miles north-northwest of Philadelphia. It is the center of a region of mines of anthracite coal, and has manufactures of machinery, etc. It was settled about 1770. Population (1900), 51,721.

Wilkie (wil'ki), Sir David. Born at Culter, Fifeshire, Scotland, Nov. 18, 1785; died at sea off Gibraltar, June 1, 1841. A noted Scottish genre-painter. He studied painting at Edinburgh; settled in London in 1805; became a royal academician in 1811; traveled on the Continent, especially 1825-28; became royal painter in ordinary in 1830; was knighted in 1836.

Wilkinasaga. A collection of medieval Norwegian legends relating to Dietrich of Bern and others.

Wilkins (wil'kinz), John. Born in Northamptonshire, 1614; died Nov. 19, 1672. An English divine and scientist, bishop of Chester. He graduated at Oxford (Magdalen Hall) in 1631, and in 1659 became master of Trinity College, Cambridge. He assisted in founding the Royal Society. He published "Discovery of a New World" (1638), "Discourse Concerning a New Planet" (1640), "Mercury, or the Secret Messenger" (1641), "Mathematical Magic" (1648), "Essay toward a Real Character and a Philosophical Language" (1668), "Principles and Duties of Natural Religion" (1675).

Perhaps the works of the celebrated Bishop Wilkins tended more than any others to the diffusion of the Copernican system in England, since even their extravagancies drew a stronger attention to them. In 1638, when he was only twenty-four years old, he published a book entitled "The Discovery of a New World; or, a Discourse tending to prove that it is probable there may be another habitable World in the Moon; with a Discourse concerning the possibility of a passage thither." The latter part of his subject was, of course, an obvious mark for the sneers and witticisms of critics. Two years afterwards, in 1640, appeared his "Discourse concerning a new Planet"; tending to prove it is probable our Earth is one of the Planets"; in which he urged the reasons in favour of the heliocentric system, and explained away the opposite arguments.

Whewell, Ind. Sciences, I. 300.

Wilkins, Mary Eleanor (Mrs. Charles Manning Freeman). A contemporary American writer. She is principally noted as an exponent of New England life and character. Among her works are "The Pool of Gold and Other Stories" (1892), "Young Lucretia and Other Stories" (1892), "Jane Field," a novel (1892), "Giles Corey, Yeoman," a play (1893), "Penbrooke," a novel (1894), etc.

Wilkins, William. Born at Carlisle, Pa., Dec. 20, 1779; died at Homewood, Allegheny County, Pa., June 23, 1865. An American politician. He was Democratic United States senator from Pennsylvania 1831-34; received the electoral votes of Pennsylvania for Vice-President in 1832; was United States minister to Russia 1834-35; was member of Congress from Pennsylvania 1843-44; and was secretary of war 1844-45.

Wilkinson (wil'kin-son), James. Born at Benedict, Maryland, 1757; died near the city of Mexico, Dec. 29, 1825. An American general and politician. He served in the Revolutionary War in Canada and at Saratoga, attaining the rank of brevet brigadier-general; became secretary of the board of war; was in the Conway Cabal; engaged in trade in the Mississippi valley; attempted treasonably to detach Kentucky from the Union and ally it with Spain; served in the Indian wars, and commanded the right wing in Wayne's victory of Mautsee in 1794; became a brigadier-general in 1792; succeeded Wayne as commander-in-chief of the army; was appointed commissioner to receive Louisiana from the French; and was governor of Louisiana 1805-06. He was implicated in Burr's conspiracy, and was court-martialed in 1811, but acquitted. In 1813 he became major-general. He failed as commander in the operations against Canada; was acquitted by a court of inquiry in 1815; but was discharged from the service. He wrote "Memoirs" (1816).

Wilkinson, Jemima. Born in Rhode Island about 1753; died 1819. An American religious impostor. She asserted that she had been raised from the dead, and founded a short-lived sect.

Wilkinson, Sir John Gardner. Born at Harpendale, Westmoreland, Oct. 5, 1797; died Oct. 29, 1875. An English Egyptologist. He was educated at Oxford (Exeter College), and from 1821 spent many years in Egypt in archaeological explorations. His works include "Manners and Customs of the Ancient Egyptians" (1837-41), "Materia Hieroglyphica" (1828), "Topography of Thebes and General View of Egypt" (1835), "Modern Egypt and Thebes" (1843; later reissued as "Hand-Book for Travellers in Modern Egypt"), "Dalmatia and Montenegro" (1848), "Architecture of Ancient Egypt" (1850), "Popular Account of the Ancient Egyptians" (1853), "The Egyptians in the Time of the Pharaohs" (1857), etc.

Wilkinson (wil'kin-son), Tate. Born in 1739; died in 1808. An English actor. He was a pupil and associate of Foote, and a noted mimic. He played with success in London and Dublin, but preferred the provinces. After a time he grew weary of his wandering life, and bought the lease of the York circuit, which he conducted for more than thirty years. Many actors and actresses who were afterward successful on the London stage owed their first encouragement to him; among others Kemble, Fawcett, the elder Mathews, Mrs. Jordan, and Mrs. Siddons.

Willamette (wil-ä'met) River. A river in western Oregon, formed by the Middle Fork and McKenzie Fork. It joins the Columbia north of Portland. On it are Salem and Portland. Length, about 250 miles; navigable to the falls at Oregon City, and above them to Eugene City.

She was secretary in 1874 and president in 1879 of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and editor in 1879 of the Chicago "Evening Post." In 1883 she made a journey through the Southern States, founding branches of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. In 1884 she was one of the organizers of the Prohibition Party. In 1887 she was president of the Women's Council of the United States. She wrote "Women and Temperance" (1833), "How to Win" (1886), "Glimpses of Fifty Years" (1889), etc.

Willcox (wil'kokz), Orlando Bolivar. Born at Detroit, Mich., April 16, 1823. An American general. He graduated at West Point in 1847; became colonel in May, 1861; commanded a brigade at Bull Run, and was wounded and captured; was a division commander in the Army of the Potomac (9th corps), and received the surrender of Petersburg in 1865. In 1864 he was brevetted major-general of volunteers, and in 1866 was mustered out and was recommissioned in the same year in the regular army; was brevetted brigadier-general and major-general in 1867; was commander of various posts and departments; and became brigadier-general in 1886. He retired in 1887.

Willems (wil'emz), Florent. Born at Liège, Jan. 8, 1823. A Belgian genre-painter. He studied at the Mechlin Academy, and settled in Paris in 1844. Among his pictures are "Visit to a Young Mother" (1844), "Woman and Spinning-Wheel" (Kunsthal, Hamburg), "Adorning the Bride" (Brussels Museum), "Silk-mercer's Shop," "Sealing the Love-letter," "Departing for the Promenade," "The Music-lesson." The last three and a number of others are owned in the United States.

Willey (wil'i), Mount. A mountain on one side of the Crawford Notch, White Mountains, New Hampshire, 4,261 feet high. A landslide in 1826 overwhelmed the inhabitants of the Willey House at its foot.

William (wil'yam). A country fellow in love with Audrey; a character in Shakespeare's "As you Like it."

William (wil'yam) I., surnamed "The Conqueror," "The Norman," and "The Bastard." [ME. William, OF. Willalme, Willalme, Guillaume, F. Guillaume, Sp. Guillermo, Pg. Guilherme, It. Guiglielmo, ML. Guilielmus, Guillelmus, Guillelmus, Gulielmus, D. Willelm, from OHG. Willahelm, Willihelm, MHG. Willehelm, Willelm, G. Wilhelm, helm of resolution, an epithet of a warrior.] Born at Falaise, Normandy, in 1027 or 1028; died at St.-Gervais, near Ronen, Sept. 9, 1087. King of England 1066-87. He was the natural son of Robert, duke of Normandy, and Herleva, daughter of Fulbert, a tanner of Falaise. He succeeded to the duchy on the death of his father without legitimate issue in 1035. With the assistance of his suzerain, Henry, king of France, he put down a formidable rising of his vassals in the battle of Val-es-Dunes, near Caen, in 1047. In a war which broke out between Henry and Geoffrey, count of Anjou, the next year, he sided with the former, and took possession of the important border fortresses of Alençon and Domfront. He visited, in 1051, his childless kinsman Edward the Confessor, from whom he afterward claimed to have received a promise of the succession to the English throne. In 1052 he married Matilda of Flanders, a descendant of Alfred. He repelled an invasion by the allied armies of Henry, Geoffrey of Anjou, and Theobald of Blois at Mortemer in 1054. Soon after he exacted the homage of Geoffrey of Anjou, and in 1058, by the victory of Varville, repelled a second invasion headed by the French king. In 1063 he acquired Maine, which extended his southern frontier almost to the Loire. Probably in 1064, Harold, earl of Wessex, was shipwrecked on the coast of Normandy and fell into the hands of William, who compelled him to take an oath whereby he bound himself to assist the duke in obtaining the succession in England (see Harold II, King of the English). Edward died Jan. 5, 1066, and Harold, in defiance of the oath, procured his own election by the witan. William, on the other hand, obtained a bull from Pope Alexander II., which declared him to be the rightful heir to the throne; landed at Pevensey Sept. 23; overthrew Harold (who fell in the battle) at Senlac or Hastings, Oct. 14; and was crowned at Westminster Dec. 25, 1066. But the conquest of England was only partial; it was completed four years later (in 1070) by the suppression of the last of a succession of English risings in the north and southwest. William exacted the homage of Malcolm of Scotland in 1072. In 1075-76 he put down a rebellion of the Norman barons in England, which thenceforth remained quiet. The rest of his reign was occupied with almost continuous wars on the Continent against the King of France and rebellious vassals, and with quarrels with members of his own family, especially with his son Robert, who headed a revolt in Normandy 1077-80, and with his half-brother Odo, bishop of Bayeux, who was imprisoned on account of his intrigues. William died of internal injuries received from the plunging of his horse in the burning cinders in the town of Mantes, which he had captured while engaged with Philip of France in a war concerning Vexin. William made few changes in the English law; indeed, he renewed, with some additions, the law of Edward the Confessor. However, his introduction of continental feudalism was destined to exercise an enduring social and political influence. He took care to prevent the Norman barons whom he planted on English soil from becoming formidable rivals of the crown, by scattering their estates, by maintaining popular courts by the side of the manorial courts, and by requiring an oath of fealty from all landowners, thereby eliminating an essential and dangerous feature of continental feudalism, the exclusive dependence of a vassal on his lord (Gnomon of Salisbury, 1880). He abolished the four great earldoms, which had threatened the integrity of the kingdom in preceding reigns, and restricted the jurisdiction of the earl to a single shire, which became the largest political division, and the government of which was practically exercised by the sheriff, who was appointed by the king. In 1086 he completed the "Doomsday Book" (which see). He also reorganized the English Church with the assistance of Lanfranc whom he appointed archbishop of Canterbury. He separated the spiritual from the temporal courts, and secured the authority of the crown against papal encroachments.

Norman writers, Norman records, the general consent of the age, confirmed rather than confuted by the significant silence of the English writers, all lead us to believe that, at some time or other, some kind of promise of the succession was made by Edward to William. The case of Edward's promise is like the case of Harold's oath. No English writer mentions either; but the silence of the English writers confirms rather than disproves the fact of both. . . . The law of England gave the king no power to dispose of a crown which he held solely by the free choice of the witan of the land. All that Edward could constitutionally do was to pledge himself to make in William's favour that recommendation to the witan which the witan were bound to consider, though not necessarily to consent to. That, when the time came, Edward did make such a recommendation, and did not make it in favour of William, we know for certain. The last will of Edward, so far as such an expression can be allowed, was undoubtedly in favour of Harold.

Freeman, History of the Norman Conquest in England, [pp. 299-301.]

William II., surnamed Rufus ('the Red'). Born 1056; died Aug. 2, 1100. King of England 1087-1100, third (second surviving) son of William I. and Matilda of Flanders. He was the favorite son of his father, to whom he remained loyal when his elder brother Robert raised the standard of rebellion in Normandy. In accordance with the dying request of his father, he was elected to the English throne by the witan, through the influence of Lanfranc, Sept. 26, 1087, while Robert succeeded in Normandy. A revolt of the Norman barons in England broke out in favor of Robert in 1088. William gained the support of the fyrd, or national militia, by promising the repeal of the forest laws, the reduction of taxes, and good government generally to his English subjects, and the rebellion was suppressed in 1090. He carried on a war in Normandy 1090-91 against his brother Robert, who was compelled to accept a disadvantageous peace. He invaded Scotland in 1091, when he exacted the homage of Malcolm III. In 1093 he appointed Anselm, abbot of Bec, archbishop of Canterbury; but presently became involved in a dispute concerning investitures with the new primate, who abandoned the kingdom in 1097. In 1094, during a second invasion of Normandy, he found his brother supported by Philip of France, and secured the safe retreat of his army only by a bribe to the latter. In 1096 he took possession of Normandy as a pledge for funds advanced to Robert, who in that year joined in the Crusade. The duchy remained in William's hands until his death. He conquered Maine 1098-99. He was killed, possibly accidentally, by an arrow shot by Walter Tyrril, while hunting in the New Forest.

William III. Born at The Hague, Nov. 14, 1650; died at Kensington, March 8, 1702. King of England 1689-1702, and stadholder of the United Netherlands. He was the son of William II., stadholder of the United Netherlands, and Mary, daughter of Charles I. of England, and was styled Prince of Orange before his accession to the English throne. His father died before his birth. As the head of the house of Orange he became the leader of the democratic monarchial party in opposition to the aristocratic republican party headed by Jan de Witt. The invasion of Holland by the armies of Louis XIV. in 1672 caused the overthrow of the aristocratic republican party, and in the same year the office of stadholder, which had been abolished on the death of his father, was restored in his favor. He saved Amsterdam by opening the dikes, and succeeded in forming a coalition against Louis XIV. which compelled that monarch to conclude the peace of Nimwegen (1678). He married in 1677 Mary, elder daughter of the Duke of York who ascended the English throne as James II. in 1685. About 1686 he placed himself at the head of the constitutional opposition in England against the absolute and Romanizing policy of James; and, in answer to an invitation signed by the "seven patriots" (the Earl of Devonshire, the Earl of Shrewsbury, the Earl of Danby, the Bishop of London, Henry Sidney, Lord Lumley, and Admiral Russell), landed at Torbay, Nov. 5, 1688. James fled to France Dec. 22, 1689, and William summoned a convention which met Jan. 22, 1689, and settled the crown on William and Mary, who accepted the Declaration of Right, and were proclaimed Feb. 13, 1689. The revolution was effected in England without serious opposition, but James had many adherents in Scotland and Ireland. With the assistance of Louis XIV. he landed at Kinsale, Ireland, March 14, 1689. War was declared against France May 7, 1689; the Jacobite rising in Scotland ended with the battle of Killiecrankie July 27 (N. S.), 1689; and James was defeated in person by William at the battle of the Boyne in Ireland, July 1, 1690. In 1692 occurred the massacre of Glencoe (which see). On his accession to the English throne, William began the organization of the Grand Alliance of the United Netherlands, the emperor, England, Spain, Brandenburg, and Savoy, against France, which was completed in 1690. A victory of the allied English and Dutch fleets over the French at La Hogue May 19, 1692, frustrated a projected invasion of England. William, who commanded the Allies in Flanders, was defeated by Marshal Luxembourg at Steenkerke July 24 (N. S. Aug. 3), 1692. Queen Mary died Dec. 28, 1694; thenceforth William reigned alone. The peace of Ryswick put an end to the war with France in 1697. During the rest of his reign his foreign policy was chiefly directed to preserving the balance of power in Europe by preventing the Spanish monarchy from being united either to France or to Austria. With this end in view, he negotiated the Partition Treaties (which see). When Louis XIV., in violation of treaty obligations, recognized the bequest of Charles II. to Philip of Anjou, William formed the Grand Alliance of 1701, and took the initiative in the events leading to the War of the Spanish Succession (see this title). He died, in consequence of a fall from his horse, before the commencement of hostilities, leaving no heirs. His reign, although disturbed by Jacobite intrigues and the treachery of officials high in station (such as Marlborough), witnessed the rise of England to a position of prominence in European politics, and marks the beginning of government by party.

William IV. Born at Windsor, Aug. 21, 1765; died June 20, 1837. King of England 1830-37, third son of George III. He entered the navy as a midshipman about 1779; was created duke of Clarence in 1789; married Adelaide of Saxe-Meiningen in 1818; became heir presumptive to the throne on the death of the Duke of York in 1827; and in the same year was appointed lord high admiral, an office which he was shortly compelled to resign on account of his arbitrary conduct. He acceded to the throne on the death of his brother, George IV., June 26, 1830. The chief events of his reign were the passage of the Reform Bill and of the Emancipation Bill.

William I. (G. Wilhelm). Born at Berlin, March 22, 1797; died there, March 9, 1888. German emperor (1871-88) and king of Prussia (1861-88), second son of Frederick William III. of Prussia and Louisa, daughter of Duke Charles of Mecklenburg-Strelitz. He served with distinction in the campaigns of 1814 and 1815 against Napoleon; married Augusta of Saxe-Weimar in 1820; became heir presumptive and received the title of Prince of Prussia on the death of his father and the accession of his brother Frederick William IV. in 1840; made himself extremely unpopular on account of his conservative attitude during the revolutionary movement of 1848; took his seat in the Prussian National Assembly in the same year; commanded the Prussian army which suppressed the insurrections in Baden and the Palatinate in 1849; was appointed military governor of the Rhineland and Westphalia in the same year; was promoted to the rank of field-marshal and made governor of the federal fortress of Mainz in 1854; assumed the regency for his brother Frederick William in 1858; ascended the throne of Prussia on the death of the latter, Jan. 2, 1861; appointed Bismarck minister of foreign affairs in 1862; united with Austria in a war against Denmark in 1864 (see Schleswig-Holstein Wars, 2); commanded in person at Koniggratz in the Austro-Prussian war (see Seven Weeks' War) in 1866; and became president of the North German Confederation on the adoption of its constitution in 1867. He commanded the German armies in the Franco-German war 1870-71, being present at Gravelotte and Sedan, and maintaining his headquarters at Versailles Oct. 1870, March 1871, during and after the siege of Paris. He was proclaimed German emperor at Versailles Jan. 18, 1871, and returned to Berlin March 17, 1871. He displayed great sagacity in selecting his ministers and generals, as well as firmness in supporting them against opposition; and shares with Bismarck, Von Roon, and Von Moltke the honor of accomplishing the unification of Germany, under the hegemony of Prussia.

William II. (Friedrich Wilhelm Victor Albert). Born at Berlin, Jan. 27, 1859. Emperor of Germany and king of Prussia, son of Frederick III. and Princess Victoria of England, and grandson of William I. He was educated at the gymnasium of Cassel and the University of Bonn; married Augusta Victoria of Schleswig-Holstein in 1881; and succeeded his father as king and emperor June 15, 1888. He immediately displayed his intention to exercise personal control of the government, and in March, 1890, dismissed Bismarck who disapproved of his policy.

William, King of Germany. See William of Holland.

William I. Born at The Hague, Aug. 24, 1772; died at Berlin, Dec. 12, 1843. King of the Netherlands 1815-40, son of William V. the last stadholder. He commanded the Dutch troops against the French from 1793 to 1795, when the Netherlands were conquered by the latter and the house of Orange expelled. In 1806 he served as a general in the Prussian army, and was captured by the French at the battle of Jena. His hereditary territories in Germany (the Nassau lands) were in the same year confiscated by Napoleon. He served in the Austrian army at Wagram in 1809, and afterward lived in retirement at Berlin. He recovered his German territories in 1813. On the overthrow of Napoleon, the Netherlands and Belgium were erected into the Kingdom of the Netherlands by the Congress of Vienna; and, in accordance with its decision, William was proclaimed the first king of the new monarchy, March 16, 1815. At the same time he exchanged his German possessions for the grand duchy of Luxembourg. He was unable to prevent the secession of Belgium in 1830-32. He abdicated in favor of his son William II. Oct. 7, 1840.

William II. Born Dec. 6, 1792; died March 17, 1849. King of the Netherlands 1840-49, son of William I. He served with distinction under Wellington in Spain, and commanded the Dutch contingent in the campaign of 1815 against Napoleon. He married the Russian grand duchess Anne, sister of Alexander I., in 1816. He was sent to Belgium to effect a peaceful settlement on the outbreak of the revolution in that country in 1830; and on Oct. 16 recognized the independence of the Belgians, an act which was repudiated by his father. He subsequently commanded the Dutch army against the Belgians, but was forced to give way before the French in Aug., 1832. He ascended the throne on the abdication of his father Oct. 7, 1840. He granted extensive reforms during the revolutionary movement of 1848.

William III. Born Feb. 19, 1817; died Nov. 23, 1890. King of the Netherlands 1849-90, son of William II. He carried out the reforms begun by his father in 1848, and decreed the abolition of slavery in the West Indies in 1862. In 1866 the Dutch province of Limburg, which since 1815 had constituted part of the Germanic Confederation, was incorporated with the Netherlands, and in the following year Luxembourg was recognized as neutral territory under the sole sovereignty of his house.

William I., surnamed "The Lion." Died at Stirling, 1214. King of Scotland 1165-1214. He succeeded his brother Malcolm IV. In 1174 he invaded England, with the result that he was taken prisoner and compelled to do homage to Henry II.

William I., surnamed "The Bad." King of Sicily 1154-66.

William II., surnamed "The Good." King of Sicily 1166-89.

William I. Born at Lauban, Silesia, Sept. 27, 1781; died June 25, 1864. King of Wurtemberg 1816-64, son of Frederick I. (the first king of Wurtemberg). He commanded the Wurtemberg contingent in Napoleon's Russian campaign, and commanded a corps of the Allies 1813-15.

William, Margrave of Baden (originally Count of Hoehberg). Born at Karlsruhe, April 8, 1792; died Oct. 11, 1859. A German general. He commanded the Baden contingent in Napoleon's Russian campaign, and fought with the Allies 1814-15. He represented the house of Baden at the Congress of Vienna, and was commander of the Baden troops 1825-48.

William. Born April 25, 1806; died Oct. 18, 1884. Duke of Brunswick 1830-84, second son of Duke Frederick William. He succeeded his brother Charles, and was the last of the Brunswick-Wolfenbuettel line.

William, Prince of England. Only son of Henry I. of England, drowned in the White Ship in the English Channel in 1120.

William IV. Born 1532; died Aug. 25, 1592. Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel 1567-92, son of Philip the Magnanimous. He administered the government during the imprisonment of his father by Charles V. 1547-52. He distinguished himself as an astronomer and as a patron of astronomy.

William I. Born at Cassel, June 3, 1743; died Feb. 27, 1821. Elector of Hesse (Landgrave William IX. of Hesse-Cassel), son of Landgrave Frederick II. He furnished Hessian troops to Great Britain in the American Revolution; succeeded as landgrave in 1785; joined the coalition against France in 1792; was made elector in 1803; and was expelled by the French in 1806, his lands becoming part of the kingdom of Westphalia in 1807. He reentered Cassel in 1813, and was restored by the Congress of Vienna 1814-15.

William II. Born July 28, 1777; died Nov. 20, 1847. Elector of Hesse 1821-47, son of the elector William I. He served in the Prussian army against Napoleon. He was forced to grant a new constitution in 1831.

William I., surnamed "The Silent." Born at the castle of Dillenburg, in Nassau, April 16, 1533; died at Delft, Netherlands, July 10, 1584. Prince of Orange and Count of Nassau; the founder of the Republic of the United Provinces. He was the son of William, count of Nassau, and Juliana of Stolberg; was educated in the Roman Catholic faith as a page at the court of Charles V.; and inherited the principality of Orange, along with large estates in the Netherlands, from his cousin René or Renato in 1544. He was appointed commander of the army in the Netherlands and "Vanderdecken" (1878), "Olivia," "Nell Gwynn," "William and Susan" (1880), "Melchior," "Sedgemoor," "Faust" (1885), "Clandian" (1885), "A Royal Divorce." He also wrote several novels, among them "Notice to Quit" and "The Wife's Evidence."

Wills, William John. Born at Totnes, Devonshire, Jan. 5, 1834; died of starvation near Cooper's Creek, Australia, about July, 1861. An Australian explorer. He went to Australia in 1852, and in 1858 was made assistant in the magnetic observatory at Melbourne. On Aug. 20, 1860, he set out on the expedition led by R. O'Hara Burke to explore the interior. They crossed the continent, but on their return both Burke and Wills perished.

Will's (wilz) Coffee-House. A famous coffee-house in Russell street, London, named from its proprietor, whose first name was William. It was the resort of gamblers, and of poets and wits, in the time of Dryden, when it was also known as "The Wits' Coffee-House." It was on the corner of Bow street.

Winchelsea, Countess of. See Finch, Anne.
Winchester (win'ches-tér). [Welsh Caer Gwent, white castle; ML. Venta Belgarum, AS. Wint-ceaster.] A city in Hampshire, England, on the Itchen 11 miles north-northeast of Southampton. Its cathedral is a large church exemplifying much of the development of English architecture. The choir, with square chevet and projecting Lady chapel, shows some excellent 13th-century stonework and good perpendicular work in the clearstory and chapel; but most of the exterior is uninteresting. The round-arched tower at the crossing is low and heavy. The Perpendicular west front, with three portals and a great window, resembles a mechanical copy in stone of a framing of upright beams. The interior presents much that is of interest. The long nave is light and well proportioned, with elaborate English groining. The aisled transepts are of the most impressive early-Norman work. The fine carved stalls are of the 13th century. Among the many interesting tombs is that of Isaac Walton (1683). Winchester was successively a British, a Roman, and a Saxon town. It was the capital of Wessex, and the place of residence and coronation of early English kings, and the seat of early English parliaments. In the middle ages it was noted for its commerce, and was especially famous for woolen manufactures. Population (1891), 19,073.

A German critic and author, the founder of scientific archaeology and of the history of classic art. He was the son of a poor shoemaker. With the assistance of the rector of his school he was enabled to go to the gymnasium at Berlin; and subsequently (1738) studied theology at Halle, where he supported himself by giving private instruction. In 1743 he received a position in the school at Seehausen; in 1748 he was made librarian to the Count von Bünau in Dresden, where he had an opportunity to continue the study of art and archaeology, begun at the University of Halle. In 1754 he became a convert to the Roman Catholic Church, and in 1755 was sent by the papal nuncio to Italy. He devoted himself thenceforth entirely to the study of art. In 1764 appeared his principal work, "Geschichte der Kunst des Altertums" ("History of the Art of Antiquity"). A previous work was "Gedanken über die Nachahmung der griechischen Werke in der Malerei und Bildhauerkunst" ("Thoughts on the Imitation of Greek Works in Painting and Sculpture," 1755). For a number of years he was papal antiquary in Rome. In 1768 he set out on a journey to Germany, but in Vienna again turned back for Italy. In Trieste he was murdered by an Italian.

Windsor (win'zor). A town in Berkshire, England, situated on the Thames 23 miles west of London. It contains a famous royal residence, Windsor Castle, founded by William the Conqueror, extended by his successors, especially by Edward III., and recently restored by Queen Victoria. The castle consists of two inclosed courts separated by the huge round tower or keep. On the lower court or ward face the famous Chapel of St. George and the Albert Chapel (see below). The upper ward is entered by the so-called Norman gateway, which is a pointed arch flanked by cylindrical towers. The east side of the quadrangle is occupied by the king's private apartments, and the north side by the state apartments. The latter contain many fine works of art and historic relics. St. George's Hall, 200 by 34 feet, is adorned with portraits of British sovereigns by the best contemporary masters. The Waterloo chamber or grand dining-room, the council-chamber, and the state drawing-room contain paintings of equal interest. All the paintings in the old ball-room are portraits by Van Dyke, among them Charles I. and his family and four portraits of Queen Henrietta Maria. The private apartments are of high interest, and contain one of the most splendid collections of porcelain existing, especially rich in old Sevres secured during the French Revolution. The gardens and terraces are very beautiful, and the views of the exterior of the castle, embodying long stretches of battlemented walls broken by numerous towers and dominated by the enormous donjon, are unique. St. George's Chapel, founded by Edward IV. in 1474 and finished by Henry VIII., is in a rich Perpendicular style, with double transepts. The interior is very wide and has elaborate fan-vaulting. The choir is bordered by the ornate carved stalls of the Knights of the Garter, adorned with their arms. Over every stall hangs the banner of its holder. At the east end, over the fine reredos, is a great Perpendicular window filled with painted glass in memory of Prince Albert. The Albert Chapel, immediately to the east of St. George's Chapel, was built by Henry VII., and George III. formed the royal tomb-house under it. It was restored by Queen Victoria as a memorial of her husband, and the interior is decorated in so lavish a manner that it forms one of the most remarkable existing examples of such work: it is incrustated with colored marbles, and covered throughout with sculpture, mosaics, gilding, and precious stones. The windows are filled with glass painted with scriptural scenes and subjects from the family history of the Prince Consort, and the fan-vaulting of the ceiling is covered with Venetian mosaics. Toward the east end is a cenotaph of the prince in the form of an altar-tomb. The sculptured and inlaid reredos is by Sir G. G. Scott. The royal mausoleum at Frogmore, near the castle, built by Queen Victoria to receive the body of her husband, is in a modified Byzantine style of architecture, octagonal in plan, surmounted by a lantern, and ornamented with series of arcades. Windsor Forest is near the town. Population (1901), 12,153.

Windsor. A seaport, capital of Hants County, Nova Scotia, situated on an arm of Minas Basin, 35 miles northwest of Halifax. Population (1901), 3,398.

Windsor. A town in Hartford County, Connecticut, situated on the Connecticut 6 miles north of Hartford. Population (1900), 3,614.

Windsor Beauties. A series of 11 portraits of the most noted beauties of the court of Charles II., by Sir Peter Lely. Ten of these paintings are now in Hampton Court Palace, England; the eleventh, the portrait of Madame d'Orléans, is lost. All are painted in the same style, in three-quarter length, with lightly draped busts, bare-headed with hair in ringlets, and with landscape backgrounds.

He separated from that church and organized, in 1830, the new denomination of the Church of God, or Winebrennerians.

Winfrid, or Winfrith. See Boniface.

Wing and Wing. A novel by Cooper, published in 1842.

Winged Lion, or Lion of St. Mark. A symbolical lion, represented as winged and holding an open book on which is written Par tibi, Marce, Evangelista meus, or a part of this. It is the characteristic device of Venice. The full heraldic description requires a sword, with the point uppermost, above the book on the dexter side, and a glory surrounding the whole. The lion also is sejant; but in artistic representations this is continually departed from.

Wingfield (wing'fild), Edwin Maria. Born in England about 1570; died after 1608. An English merchant; one of the first colonists in Virginia (1607), and first president of the colony. He quarreled with his associates; was deposed; and returned to England.

Wingless Victory. See Nike Apteris, Temple of, and Victory.

Winkelried (vink'el-réd), Arnold von. A Swiss patriot from Stans in Unterwalden, said to have decided the Swiss victory at Sempach in 1386 by grasping all the Austrian pikes he could reach and burying them in his own breast, thus making an opening in the ranks into which the Swiss rushed over his dead body. The truth of the tradition is disputed in modern times.

Wisby, Laws of. A code or compilation of maritime customs and adjudications adopted by the town of Wisby, in the island of Gotland, in the Baltic Sea. By the law-writers of the northern European nations it has been claimed that these laws are older than the Laws of Oleron; but the better opinion seems to be that they are later, and in some respects an improvement upon them. The code was not established by legislative authority, but its provisions have obtained the sanction of general use and observance from their intrinsic equity and convenience. Sometimes called the Gotland Sea Laws.

Wisconsin (wis-kon'sin). A Northwestern State of the United States. It is bounded by Lake Superior, Michigan (partly separated by the Menominee River), Lake Michigan, Illinois, Iowa (separated by the Mississippi), and Minnesota (nearly separated by the Mississippi and St. Croix rivers). Woffington (wof'ing-ton), Margaret or Peg. Born at Dublin, Oct. 18, 1720; died at Teddington, March 28, 1760. A celebrated Irish actress, the daughter of a bricklayer. She appeared as Polly Peacham, with a company of children, in "The Beggar's Opera" when only twelve years old, and made her first appearance as a mature actress at Dublin in 1737 as Ophelia. Until 1740 she played a wide range of parts there. In that year she made her first appearance at Covent Garden as Sylvia in "The Recruiting Officer." Her success was great, and her singing and the "finish" of the male characters she assumed made the fortunes of the theaters where she played. She lived for some time with Garrick and Macklin at No. 6 Bow street, London, and Garrick was reported to have married her, but without foundation. She attempted to atone for her lack of moral character by her charities, though the almshouses at Teddington said to have been founded by her are of much earlier date. She was seized with paralysis while playing Rosalind, May 3, 1757, and never appeared again. See Masks and Faces.

Mrs. Woffington was the only player who acted Sir Harry Wildair with the spirit and elegance of the original—Wilks—to whom Garrick and Woodward were, in this part, inferior. She was excellent in Lady Plyant, and admirable in the representation of females in high rank and of dignified elegance. Millamant, Lady Townley, Lady Betty Modish, and Maria in the "Nonjuror," were exhibited by her with that happy ease and gaiety, and with such powerful attraction, that the excesses of these characters appeared not only pardonable, but agreeable.

Wolfram von Eschenbach (vöf'rim fon esh'en-bäch). Place and date of birth unknown; he died about 1220 (place unknown). A Middle High German poet of the latter part of the 12th and the beginning of the 13th century; the greatest epic poet of medieval Germany. He was of noble origin, and received his name from the little town of Eschenbach, near Ansbach, Bavaria, which was the ancestral seat of his family. His own home was at Wildenberg, near Ansbach, where he lived with his wife and child; but he was frequently at the court of that patron of poets, the landgrave Hermann of Thuringia, at Eisenach. He could not read or write, but knew French. He made frequent references to his poverty. He was buried in the Frauenkirche at Eschenbach. He composed lyrics, among them four "Tagelieder" ("Day Songs"); but his principal works are the three epic poems "Parzival," "Titurel" (left uncompleted), and "Wilhelm" (also incomplete). "Parzival," the greatest court epic of Germany, was written between 1205 and 1215; it is based upon French sources of ultimate Celtic origin, particularly upon a poem by Chretien de Troyes, "Titurel," written possibly about 1210, goes back to similar sources. The subject-matter of both poems is the legend of the Holy Grail: the former is named from its hero Parzival, the latter from Titurel, the first Knight of the Grail. "Wilhelm" (Count William of Aquitaine), begun before 1216, is from French national poetry. "Titurel" was subsequently rewritten and completed by a certain Albrecht between 1260 and 1270. "Wilhelm" was later on continued by Ulrich von Turkheim and Ulrich von dem Turin. Wolfram's works were published by Karl Lachmann in 1833 (5th ed. in 1880).

Works and Days. [Gr. Ἔργα καὶ Ἡμέραι.] The chief poem of Hesiod; so named because it treats of the labors of the farmer, and the lucky and unlucky days for doing them.

In the "Works and Days" there are really three parts, which may once have been distinct: an introductory poem addressed to his brother Perses—then the "Works" proper—and then the "Days," or Calendar. Hesiod and his younger brother Perses had divided the property left by their father, but Perses had got the larger share, Hesiod says by bribing certain judges. Perses now lived in luxurious idleness, and presently threatened Hesiod with another lawsuit. Hesiod reminds Perses and the corrupt judges that Justice, when wronged on earth, takes refuge with her father Zeus. Here we meet with the earliest fable in Greek literature, the "Hawk and the Nightingale." The hawk has the nightingale in his clutches, and in answer to the captive's complaint reminds her that "might is right." Here, too, the poet describes the "Five Ages" of the world—the age of gold, of silver, of bronze, of heroes or demigods (put in, apparently, to make a place for the Homeric heroes), and of iron, in which the poet himself has the misfortune to live. From Justice the theme changes to work. "Work, foolish Perses; work the work that the gods have set for men." A man who means to work should provide himself with a house, an ox, and household stuff, and that speedily, for delay fills no granaries. The cry of the crane is the signal for ploughing; the master must guide the plough, with many a prayer to Zeus and Demeter, while a slave follows and covers up the seed, "to give trouble to the birds." Jebb, Greek Lit., p. 42.

Württemberg, G. Württemberg (vürt'tem-berg), formerly Wirtemberg. A kingdom of southern Germany, and a state of the German Empire, the third in area and the fourth in population. Capital, Stuttgart. It is bounded by Bavaria on the northeast, east, and southeast, by Lake Constance on the south, and by Baden on the southwest, west, and northwest. It nearly incloses Hohenzollern, and has exclaves in Hohenzollern and Baden. The Black Forest is in the southwest, and the Swabian Jura traverses the country from southwest to northeast. The chief rivers are the Neckar and Danube. It is an agricultural country, producing wheat, oats, hemp, barley, potatoes, hops, wine, timber, etc.; it has also manufactures of cotton and woolen goods, paper, arms, powder, etc. Württemberg is divided into four circles (Kreise): Neckar, Jagst, Black Forest, and Danube. The government is a hereditary constitutional monarchy. The estates of the realm consist of an upper chamber and a second chamber. It sends 4 representatives to the Bundesrat and 17 to the Reichstag. Over two thirds of the population are Protestant, and less than one third Roman Catholic. The early inhabitants of this region were the Sævi. It was partly under Roman rule from the 1st to the 3d century; was overrun by the Alamanni, who were conquered by Clovis; and formed part of the duchy of Swabia. The real history of Württemberg begins in the 13th century with its counts. Count Eberhard im Bart was raised to the rank of duke in 1495. Württemberg suffered in the Thirty Years' War; ceded Montbéliard to France (which had seized it in 1793) in 1796; received considerable territory in 1803, and the electorate; became a kingdom in 1806, and joined the Confederation of the Rhine; sided with the Allies in 1813; entered the Germanic Confederation; received a constitution in 1819; was the scene of liberal movements in 1848-50; and sided with Austria in 1866, and was forced to pay an indemnity. It entered the German Empire in 1871. Area, 7,528 square miles. Population (1900), 2,169,450.

Würzburg (vürtz'börg). An ancient bishopric and principality of the German Empire, founded in 741 (?). The greater part of it was granted to Bavaria in 1803; it was given to the former Grand Duke of Tuscany in 1805, and made an electorate; entered the Confederation of the Rhine in 1806, and became a grand duchy; and was ceded to Bavaria in 1815.

Würzburg. The capital of Lower Franconia, Bavaria, situated on the Main in lat. 49° 47' N., long. 9° 54' E. It is a commercial center, and has manufactures of tobacco, beer, railway-carriages, etc. It contains the former episcopal (now royal) palace, begun in 1720 in the rococo style, and one of the most effective examples of its type. It measures 550 by 250 feet. The grand staircase is unusually fine, and like the chapel is frescoed by Tiepolo. The University of Würzburg was founded in 1403, but was soon discontinued, and was re-founded in 1582. It became noted especially for its medical department. Würzburg was the capital of the old principality of Würzburg, and the capital of a grand duchy in Napoleonic times. Its citadel was bombarded by the Prussians July 27, 1866, and the town was entered by the Prussians Aug. 2. Population (1890), 61,039.

Wyandot, or Wyandotte (wi'an-dot), or Wandot (won'dot). [The name means 'calf of the leg,' referring to a peculiar style of cutting meat. The French name was Huron, from the French hure, the arrangement of the hair by the tribe suggesting the bristles of a wild boar.] A tribe of North American Indians. When first known (about 1615) they occupied a narrow territory between Georgian Bay and Lake Simcoe in Ontario. They were then at war with the Iroquois, and the contest was continued until their defeat by the latter in 1648-49, when many fled to the Tionontati, and with them were driven from place to place. The present name came into use after the removal of part of the tribe together with the Tionontati, then incorporated in it, from Detroit to Sandusky in 1751. Subsequently they spread along the whole south and west shores of Lake Erie, and acquired a permanent influence among the tribes of the region. They sided with the French until the close of Pontiac's war, and afterward supported the British in the War of 1812. They now number about 700, chiefly at Quapaw agency (Indian Territory) and in Canada. See Iroquoian.

Wyatt (wi'at), or Wyatt (wi'at), Sir Thomas. Born in Kent, 1503; died at Sherborne, Dorsetshire, Oct. 10, 1542. An English diplomatist and poet, sent by Henry VIII. on various diplomatic missions. He wrote the first English sonnets, and his poems were printed with Surrey's in 1557.

Wyatt, Sir Thomas, "The Younger." Born about 1520; executed at London, April 11, 1554. Son of Sir Thomas Wyatt. He commanded at Boulogne; joined with the Duke of Suffolk in favor of Lady Jane Grey and against Queen Mary 1553-54; and led the men of Kent against London in Feb., 1554, but was captured. Webster and Dekker wrote a play on the subject, called "The Famous History of Sir Thomas Wyatt." It was printed in 1607.

Wyatt's Rebellion. The unsuccessful insurrection against Queen Mary and in favor of Lady Jane Grey, led by the Duke of Suffolk and Sir Thomas Wyatt 1553-54.

Wyborg. See Fiborg.

Wycherley (wich'er-li), William. Born at Clive, near Shrewsbury, England, about 1640; died at London (?), Dec., 1715. An English dramatist. He went to France when quite young, and mingled in the society of the précieuses at the Hôtel de Rambouillet. On returning he went to Oxford, and later to the Middle Temple, and studied law, became a courtier at the court of Charles II.; and was imprisoned several years for debt after the death of his first wife, the Countess of Drogheda, whose fortune involved him in litigation. James II set him free, gave him a pension, and paid his debts out of admiration for his play "The Plain Dealer." In 1715 he married again, but died shortly after. He wrote the plays "Love in a Wood" (1672), "The Gentleman Dancing Master" (1672), "The Country Wife" (1673), and "The Plain Dealer" (1677).

Wych (wich) street. A London street which opens behind Holywell street, close to the entrance of Clement's Inn. It contains some curious old houses, and is very narrow. This street is famous in the annals of London thieving for the exploits of Jack Sheppard, who gave rendezvous to his boon companions at the White Lion (now pulled down) in White Lion Passage. It was from the Angel Inn in Wych street that Bishop Hooper, in 1554, was taken to die for his faith at Gloucester. Hare, London, I. 45.

Wyclif, or Wycliffe, or Wiclif, or Wickliffe (wik'lif), John. Born at Spreswel (thought to be either Hipswell or Barford), near Richmond, Yorkshire, about 1324; died at Lutterworth, Leicestershire, Dec. 31, 1384. A celebrated English religious reformer, called "the Morning Star of the Reformation." He was a fellow, and later (1360) master, of Balliol College, Oxford; and became rector of Fillingham, Lincolnshire, in the same year, and in 1363 of Ludgershall, Buckinghamshire, and in 1374 of Lutterworth. (The warden of Canterbury Hall 1365-67 was probably another John Wyclif, of Merton, Oxford, vicar of Mayfield; there is much confusion between the early life of these two.) He went with John of Gaunt as royal ambassador to confer with papal nuncios at Bruges in 1374; was a popular preacher in London; and was summoned before Convocation in 1377 as an enemy to Rome on account of his attacks on the inordinate arrogance and wealth and power of the higher clergy (this blow was really aimed at John of Gaunt). The Pope signed five bulls against him, authorizing his imprisonment. The schism in the papacy, due to the election of Clement VII. in place of Urban VI., induced him to throw off his allegiance to the papacy. He opposed the doctrine of transubstantiation at Oxford in 1380; was condemned by the university; and his party was opposed and persecuted by Courtenay (archbishop of Canterbury) and others in 1382. He went back to Lutterworth, where he wrote ceaselessly and fearlessly against papal claims, and in opposition to mere formalism. On Dec. 28, 1384, he was seized with paralysis while hearing mass, and died in a few days. In 1428 his bones were exhumed, burned, and their ashes cast into the Swift, by order of the Synod of Constance. He made the first complete translation of the Bible into English (about 1382) from the Vulgate, assisted by Nicholas of Hereford. The latter translated the Old Testament and the apocryphal books to about the third chapter of the Book of Baruch. Wyclif certainly translated the Gospels (probably about 1360), and presumably all the rest. He wrote many tracts and sermons: "De Juramento Arnaldi," "Triologus," "De officio pastorali," "De ecclesia," "De benedicta incarnatione," "De Dominio divino," etc. His works were edited by the Wyclif Society 1822-92.

Wyclifites, or Wyclifites (wik'lif-its). The followers of Wyclif: commonly called Lollards. Wyclif's doctrines, propagated in his lifetime, and later by open-air preachers called "poor priests," largely coincided with the later teachings of Luther.

Wycombe (wi'kom), or High Wycombe, or Chipping Wycombe (chip'ing wi'kom). A town in Buckinghamshire, England, 31 miles west-northwest of London. It has manufactures of chairs and lace. Population (1891), 13,435.

Wyoming (wi-ō'ming). A State of the United States, bounded by Montana, South Dakota, Nebraska, Colorado, Utah, and Idaho. Capital, Cheyenne. The surface is mountainous (the Rocky Mountains), the chief ranges being the Medicine Bow, Laramie, Sweet Water, Big Horn, Wind River, Absaroka, Teton, and Shoshone. The leading industry is stock raising. There are also valuable coal-mines and silver-mines. It contains 13 counties, has 2 senators, and sends 1 representative to Congress. Wyoming was included in large part in the Louisiana purchase; belonged formerly to Dakota Territory; was organized as a Territory in 1868; and was admitted to the Union in 1890. Area, 97,890 square miles. Population (1900), 92,531.

Wyoming Valley. A valley in Luzerne County, Pennsylvania, traversed by the North Branch of the Susquehanna. It is very fertile, and contains beds of anthracite coal. It was settled in 1762 and later years by colonists from Connecticut and Pennsylvania; and was invaded by Tories and Indians under Butler. The defeat of the Americans, July 3, 1778, and the subsequent surrender of the fort, were attended by massacres on the part of the Indians (much exaggerated in Campbell's description in his "Gertrude of Wyoming"). The settlers were finally confirmed in the possession of the valley about 1787.

Wyre (wir) Forest. A forest in Worcestershire, England.

Wyss (vis), Johann Rudolf. Born at Bern, March 13, 1781; died there, March 31, 1830. A Swiss author, professor of philosophy and chief librarian at Bern. His best-known work is "Der schweizerische Robinson" ("The Swiss Family Robinson," 1813).

Wythe (with), George. Born in Virginia, 1726; died at Richmond, June 8, 1806. An American statesman and jurist. As a member of the Virginia House of Burgesses he drew up a remonstrance to the House of Commons against the Stamp Act; was delegate to the Continental Congress and a signer of the Declaration of Independence; was speaker of the Virginia House of Delegates; was chancellor of the Virginia court; and was professor of law at William and Mary College. He was poisoned in his eighty-first year.

Xaver (ksä'ver), Prince (Franz August Xaver). Born Aug. 25, 1730; died at Dresden, June 20, 1806. Younger son of Augustus III. of Saxony and Poland. He served on the French side in the Seven Years' War, and was administrator of Saxony 1763-68.

Xavier (zav'i-ër; Sp. pron. hā-vē-är'), Francisco (Francis), Saint. Born at the castle of Xaviero, Navarre, April 7, 1506; died on the island of Sancian, Dec. 2, 1552. A famous Spanish Jesuit missionary, called "the Apostle of the Indies." He was educated at the University of Paris, and was one of the founders of the Society of Jesus. He went to Italy in 1538, and labored there for several years; went to Lisbon in 1540, and sailed from there in 1541 on a Portuguese mission to the East Indies; arrived in Goa in 1542; labored in western and southern India, Malacca, the Moluccas, and Japan; and died on his way to undertake a mission to China. His letters were edited in 1795. He was canonized in 1622.

Xenia (zē'nī-ä). The capital of Greene County, Ohio, 53 miles northeast of Cincinnati: the seat of several educational institutions. Population (1900), 8,696.

Xenien (ksä'ni-en). A series of epigrams by Goethe and Schiller. Most of them were directed against writers of the time.

Xenocrates (ze-nok'ra-tēz). [Gr. Ξενοκράτης.] A Platonic philosopher (396-314), the successor of Spensippus as head of the Academy, over which he presided for 25 years.

Xenophanes (ze-nof'a-nēz). [Gr. Ξενοφάνης.] Born at Colophon, Asia Minor, about 570 B. C.; died about 480 B. C. A Greek philosopher, the founder of the Eleatic school. He settled at Elea in Italy about 536 B. C. Fragments of his elegies and his didactic poem "On Nature" have been preserved.

Xenophon (zen'ō-fon). [Gr. Ξενοφών.] Born at Athens about 430 B. C.; died after 357 B. C. A celebrated Greek historian and essayist, a disciple of Socrates. He joined the expedition of Cyrus the Younger in 401, and after the battle of Cunaxa and the murder of the Greek generals became the chief leader of the 10,000 Greeks in their march to the Black Sea. (See Anabasis.) He later entered the Lacedæmonian service; fought on the Spartan side at the battle of Coronæa in 394; was banished from Athens; settled at Scillus in Eleia; and spent his last years in Corinth (?). He wrote the "Anabasis," "Hellenica" (in 7 books), the romance "Cyropædia," "Memorabilia of Socrates" (a defense of his master's memory), "Economics," essays on hunting and horsemanship, "Symposium," "Revenues of Athens," "Hiero," "Agesilaus," etc.

Xeres. See Jerez de la Frontera.

Xeres, or Jerez (hā'rās), Francisco de. Born about 1504; died after 1547. A Spanish historian. From 1530 to 1534 he was secretary of Francisco Pizarro, taking part in the conquest of Peru and returning to Spain with the first instalment of gold obtained from Atahualpa. By order of Pizarro he wrote a history of the conquest down to Atahualpa's death: this was published at Seville 1534 and 1547. There are several translations and modern editions.

Xerxes (zèrk'sēz) I. [Gr. Ξέρξης, OPers. Khsayārshā.] Born about 519 B. C.; assassinated 465 or 464 B. C. King of Persia, son of Darius Hystaspes; identical with the biblical Ahasuerus. He succeeded to the throne in 486 or 485, assembled a large army for the conquest of Greece; bridged the Hellespont; traversed Thrace, Macedonia, and Thessaly; was resisted at Thermopylæ (which see) in 480; burned Athens; and was defeated at Salamis (which see) in 480, and returned to Asia Minor. His generals were defeated at Plataea and Mycale in 479, but continued the war with Greece.

The site of this [Xerxes's] bridge is supposed to have been from Nagara Point to the low spot eastward of Sestos, where the level shore on either side is convenient for the march of troops. The channel is more than 7 stadia broad, being about 1½ miles English.

Ravelinon, Herod., IV. 33, note.

Xerxes II. King of Persia, son of Artaxerxes I. He reigned for a few weeks in 425 or 424 B. C.

Xerxes. A tragedy by Cibber, produced in 1699.

Xibalba. See Fotan.

Xibitos. See Hibitos.

Ximanas. See Jumanas.

Ximena (hē-mā'nā). In Spanish history, the wife of the Cid.

Ximena, or the Heroic Daughter. An adaptation of Corneille's "Cid" by Colley Cibber, produced in 1712, printed in 1718.

Ximenes (zi-mē'nēz; Sp. pron. hē-mā'nās), or Jimenes (hē-mā'nās), Francisco. Born at Torrelaguna, Spain, 1436; died Nov. 8, 1517. A Spanish cardinal and statesman. He studied at Alcalá de Henares and Salamanca; went to Rome; took possession of a benefice in Spain by virtue of a papal letter; but was dispossessed by the Archbishop of Toledo and imprisoned. He was afterward restored and made vicar-general; became a Franciscan monk and confessor to Queen Isabella (1492), and later a Franciscan provincial; and was made archbishop of Toledo and primate of Spain in 1495. In 1506-07 he was provisional regent of Castile; became a cardinal in 1507, and inquisitor-general; led an expedition against Oran in 1509; and was regent of Spain 1516-17. He printed the Complutensian polyglot Bible and founded the University of Alcalá de Henares.

Ximenes de Quesada (hē-mā'nās dā kā-sā'-tñā), Gonsalo. Born in Granada, Spain, about 1498; died after 1576. Conqueror of New Granada. He was a lawyer; was lieutenant of Lugo at Santa Marta; left that place to explore the interior, with 800 men, April 6, 1536; and, after enduring great hardships, reached and conquered the rich plateau of Cundinamarca, and founded Bogotá, Aug. 6, 1538. Charles V. refused to make him governor of the country, and he was persecuted and imprisoned. Later he was given military commands, and in 1569 led an expedition into the Orinoco valley in search of El Dorado. Some accounts say that he died a centenarian in 1597.

Xincas (hēn'käs). An extinct tribe of Indians of southern Guatemala, near the Pacific coast, and close to the borders of Salvador. When found by Alvarado in 1524 they were savages of a low grade, living in villages built of wood and thatch. A small vocabulary of their language which has been preserved appears to indicate a distinct stock. It has been supposed that the Xincas occupied the highlands of Guatemala previous to the advent of the Quiches and Cakchiquels.

Xingú (shēn-gō'). A southern tributary of the Amazon in the states of Matto Grosso and Pará, Brazil. It was explored by Von den Steinen in 1885. Length, about 1,100 miles; navigable for steamers 110 miles. Sometimes written Chingú.

Xiphias (zif'i-as). [L., 'the Sword-fish.'] 1. A constellation made by Petrus Theodori in the 15th century, in the south pole of the ecliptic, and now named Dorado.—2. In older authors, a sword-shaped comet.

Xiquitos. Same as Chiquitos.

Xisuthrus (zi-sō'thrus). According to Berosus the historiographer of Chaldea, the name of the last of the first decad of mythical kings of Babylonia, who was advised by the gods to save himself and his family from the deluge by building a ship. He corresponds to the Noah of Genesis and the Hasisatra of the cuneiform account of the deluge.

With the Deluge the mythical history of Babylonia takes a new departure. From this event to the Persian conquest was a period of 36,000 years, or an astronomical cycle called saros. Xisuthros, with his family and friends, alone survived the waters which drowned the rest of mankind on account of their sins. He had been ordered by the gods to build a ship, to pitch it within and without, and to stock it with animals of every species. Xisuthros sent out first a dove, then a swallow, and lastly a raven to discover whether the earth was dry. The dove and the swallow returned to the ship, and it was only when the raven flew away that the rescued hero ventured to leave his ark. He found that he had been stranded on the peak of the mountain of Nizir, "the mountain of the world," whereon the Accadians believed the heaven to rest,—where, too, they placed the habitation of their gods and the cradle of their own race. Since Nizir lay among the mountains of Pir Mam, a little south of Rowandiz, its mountain must be identified with Rowandiz itself. On its peak Xisuthros offered sacrifices, piling up cups of wine by sevens; and the rainbow, "the glory of Anu," appeared in heaven, in covenant that the world should never again be destroyed by a flood.

Sayce, Anc. Empires, p. 106.

Xivaros. See Jivaros.

Xochicalco (hō-chē-käl'kō). A locality in Mexico, 75 miles southwest of Mexico City, noted for its ruins. The principal structure is a truncated pyramid or mound with 5 terraces supported by mason-work, and a walled area on the summit. Originally there was a smaller stone pyramid on top, but most of this has been carried away for building-material.

Xochimilco (hō-chē-mēl'kō). [Nahuatl, 'field of flowers.'] One of the lakes of the Mexican valley, about 7 miles south-southeast of Mexico City. It is separated from Lake Chalco by only a narrow causeway. At the time of the conquest it was nearly or quite confluent with Lake Tezcuco, which surrounded Mexico.

Xosa (ksō'sä), or Amoxosa (ä-mä-ksō'sä). A Bantu tribe of British South Africa. Their land borders in the north on the Kei River, in the southeast on the ocean, and in the south on Cape Colony. They are closely related to the Zulus. Their language is one of the oldest forms of Bantu speech. Owing to the custom of "uku-hlonipa," which forbids a female to pronounce the name of any male relative, or even its emphatic syllable, the women use a different vocabulary from that of the men. The letter X in their name is the lateral click, similar to that used for urging forward a horse.

Xury (zū'ri). A servant of Robinson Crusoe: a character in Defoe's romance of that name.

X. Y. Z. Mission. An American embassy to France in 1797, consisting of C. C. Pinckney, Marshall, and Gerry. An attempt was made by three French agents (disguised as X, Y, and Z) to bribe them. The correspondence was disclosed in 1798.

or Ij (i). An arm of the Zuyder Zee, near Amsterdam, connected with the North Sea by the North Sea Canal. Yablonoi (yä-blö-noi') Mountains. The name of the Stanovoi mountain system in its southwestern part. Yacundas. See Jacundas.

Yadkin (yad'kin). The name of the Great Pee-dee in North Carolina.

Yaguas (yä-gwäs'), or Yahuas (yä-wäs'). Indians of northern Peru, on the upper Amazon between Nauta and Pebas. They were gathered into mission villages 1683-1727, but now live nearly in a wild state. They go naked, or wear only a strip of bark cloth about the loins, with feather ornaments on the head and wrists. Their arms are lances, bows and arrows, and blow-guns. Physically they are described as a handsome race, and rather light-colored; they are docile and friendly to the whites. Two or three thousand remain. The Yagua language appears to be of mixed origin: it is related to that of the Pebas.

Yahgans. See Fuegians.

Yahcos (yä-böz'). [A made name, probably meant to suggest disgust; cf. yah, an interjection of disgust.] A name given by Swift, in "Gulliver's Travels," to a feigned race of brutes having the form of man and all his degrading passions. They are placed in contrast with the Houyhnhnms, or horses endowed with reason, the whole being designed as a satire on the human race.

Yahuas. See Yaguas.

Yahveh (yä-vä'). [Heb. Yahveh or Yahweh.] The Hebrew name of God. See the extract.

There are two opinions as to what was the actual pronunciation of the sacred name while Hebrew was still a spoken language. On the one hand, we may gather from the contemporary Assyrian monuments that it was pronounced Yahu. Wherever an Israelitish name is met with in the cuneiform inscriptions which, like Jehu or Iezekiah is compounded with the divine title, the latter appears as Yahu, Jehu being Yahua, and Iezekiah Kha-zaki-yahu. Even according to the Masoretic it must be read Yeho (that is, Yahu) when it forms part of a proper name. The early Gnostics, moreover, when they transcribed it in Greek characters, wrote Ioü (that is, Yahö). On the other hand, the four consonants, Y I H V H, can hardly have been pronounced otherwise than as Yahveh, and this pronunciation is supported by the two Greek writers Theodoret and Epiphanius, who say that the word was sounded Yävë. The form Yahveh, however, is incompatible with the form Yahu (Yehö), which appears in proper names; and it has been maintained that it is due to one of those plays on words of which there are so many examples in the Old Testament. The spelling with a final h was adopted, it has been supposed, in order to remind the reader of the Hebrew verb which signifies "to be," and to which there seems to be a distinct allusion in Exod. iii. 14. Sayce, Anc. Monuments, p. 75.

Yajurveda (yä-jör-vä'dä). See Veda.

Yaka (yä'kä), or Bayaka (bü-yü'kä). A Bantu tribe of the French Congo, back of the coast-station Mayumba. They are also called Banjaka.

Yakala (yä-kä'lä), or Mayakala (mä-yä-kä'lä), also called Mayaka. A Bantu tribe of the lower Kuangu (Quango) valley, mostly in the Kongo State (lat. 6°-7° S.), but partly in Angola. Their king is called Muene Putu Kassongo, or Muata Yanyo Kassongo, and was nominally a vassal of the Muata Yanyo of Luanda. The tribe forms, ethnically and linguistically, the southern wing of the great Teke nation. The Portuguese call them Malaccas, and in history they appear as Jagas.

Yakima (yak'i-mü), or Yakama (yak'ä-mü). A tribe of North American Indians found in 1805 on the head waters of Cataract (or Klikitat) and Tapedal (or Yakima) rivers, Washington. Of late the name Yakima includes a considerable proportion of the tribes speaking the Shahaptin language and probably originally having little connection with the Yakima proper. There are now 913 Yakima on the reservation bearing their name in the State of Washington. See Shahaptin.

Yakima Pass. A pass over the Cascade Mountains in the State of Washington, about lat. 47° 20' N. Height, about 3,600 feet. It is crossed by the Northern Pacific Railroad.

Yakima River. A river in the State of Washington which joins the Columbia above the mouth of the Snake. Length, over 200 miles.

Yakonan (yä'kō-nan). A linguistic stock of North American Indians: named from a corruption of the name of the principal tribe, the Yaquina or Yakwina. It is composed of four tribes, the Yaquina, Alsea, Siuslaw, and Kuitic or Lower Umpqua. They formerly lived on the Yaquina, Alsea, Siuslaw, and Umpqua rivers, in western Oregon; the survivors are now on the Siletz reservation, Tillamook County, Oregon.

Yakone. See Yaquina.

Yakub Khan (yä-köb'khän). Born 1849. Son of Shere Ali, and his successor as ameer of Afghanistan in 1879. He signed a treaty with the British in 1879. He was suspected of complicity in the murder of the British envoy and others at Kabul on Sept. 3 in that year; was sent as prisoner to India; and was deported in 1880.

Yakuts (yä-köts'). A people of Turkish or mixed Turkish origin, dwelling in Siberia in the neighborhood of the Lena.

Yakutsk (yä-kötsk'). 1. A province of Siberia, bounded by the Arctic Ocean, the Maritime Province, Amur, Transbaikalia, Irkutsk, and Yeniseisk. The surface is largely table-land, crossed by many mountain-ranges, and with tundras in the north. It has important gold-mines. The inhabitants are principally Yakuts. Area, 1,533,397 square miles. Population (1892), 280,200.

2. The capital of the province of Yakutsk, situated near the Lena about lat. 62° N., long. 130° E. Population (1892), 5,300.

Yale (yä), Elihu. Born at or near Boston, Mass., April 5, 1648 (1649?); died in England, July 8, 1721 (buried at Wrexham, Wales). An English colonial official in India, governor of Fort St. George, Madras. He gave a donation of books and money (to the value of about £800) to the collegiate school in New Haven, which was named for him Yale College.

Yale University. A famous institution of learning at New Haven, Connecticut. It was chartered in 1701 as a collegiate school, and opened at Saybrook, Connecticut (though the classes were first held at Killingworth and Milford). A new building was erected at New Haven, and in 1718 the college was transferred there and called Yale College on account of gifts received from Elihu Yale. It received a new charter in 1745, and in 1887 took the name Yale University. Besides the academical department it includes schools of philosophy; of medicine, founded in 1812; of theology (Congregational), founded in 1822; of law, founded in 1824; the Peabody Museum of Natural History; the Sheffield Scientific School, begun in 1847; and the School of Fine Arts, founded in 1864. The library contains over 250,000 volumes. It has over 250 instructors and 2,500 students.

Yalu, Battle of the. A naval engagement between the Japanese under Vice-Admiral Ito and the Chinese under Admiral Ting In Chang, off the Yalu River, Korea, Sept. 17, 1894, in which the Japanese were victorious.

Yama (yä-mä'). [Skt., 'the Twin.'] In the Rig-veda, the name of the god who rules in heaven over the blessed—the Manes, Fathers, or Pitris—and is therefore called king. He is a son of Vivasvant, the god of the dawning daylight or morning sun, who is also the father of the Asvins. Post-Vedic times see in him the ruler of the dead in the under-world, and understand the name as meaning 'Restrauer': the real meaning is 'Twin.' Yama and his sister Yami are the first human pair, who have preceded all to the realm beyond.

Yamacraw (yä'mä-krä'). A tribe of North American Indians who lived on the lower Savannah River, Georgia. They are best known through their chief Tomochichi, who was so friendly to the English colony at Savannah that he was called their protector, and was presented at the British court in 1733 by Oglethorpe. See Muskogean.

Yamasi (yäm'ä-së), or Jamasee, or Eamuses. A tribe of North American Indians who lived, at the beginning of the 18th century, on the north side of the lower Savannah River in South Carolina. The name is from the Creek language, and means 'gentle' or 'peaceable.' In 1715 they entered into a conspiracy against the English colonists which included all the coast tribes as far north as Cape Fear: the outbreak began with a massacre. After defeat they fled to the Spanish territory of Florida, where they were attacked by the Creeks about 1733 and destroyed as a tribe, many being absorbed. See Creek and Muskogean.

Yampah (yam'pä) River, or Bear (hä) River. A river in northwestern Colorado which joins Green River near the Utah frontier.

Yana. A river in Siberia which flows into the Arctic Ocean east of the Lena. Length, about 1,000 miles.

Yanan (yä'nän), or Noje (nö'zhä), or Nezi (nö'zë). A linguistic stock of North American Indians. They formerly lived from Round Mountain near 1st River, Shasta County, to Deer Creek, Tehama County, California; and are now in two groups, one at Redding, the other at Round Mountain, California. They numbered 35 in 1884. The stock consists of a single tribe, the Yana.

Yancey (yän'si), William Lowndes. Born at Ogeechee Shoals, Ga., Aug. 10, 1814; died near Montgomery, Ala., July 28, 1863. An American politician and lawyer. He was Democratic member of Congress from Alabama 1844-46; became a leader of the Southern advocates of secession; was presidential elector in 1856; withdrew from the Democratic National Convention at Charleston in 1860; and reported the ordinance of secession in the Alabama convention in 1861. He was a Confederate agent in Europe and Confederate senator.

Yang-chau (yäng'chou'). A city in the province of Kiang-su, China, situated on the Grand Canal 35 miles northeast of Nanking. Population, estimated, about 360,000.

Yang-tse-Kiang (yäng'tse-kë-äng'), or Yang-tse, or Yang-tze (yäng'tse). ['chin., 'son of the sea.'] The largest river of the Chinese empire, called in its upper course the Kin-sha-Kiang, and lower down the Ta-Kiang ('great river'). It rises in the mountains, northern Tibet, about lat. 36° N., long. 91° E.; flows through Tibet, Koko-Nur, and China; and empties into the Yellow Sea about lat. 31° 30' N. Its chief tributaries are the Ya-lung, Min, Kialing, Han, Wu, and Lake Toonking. It is connected by the Grand Canal with the Yellow River. On it are Szechu, Kweichow, Ichang, Hankow, Klu-kiang, Ganking, and Nanking. Length, about 3,200 miles; navigable to Ichang.

Yanina. See Janina.

Yankee Doodle (yäng'kë dö'dl). An American national air, probably of English origin in the middle of the 18th century. Its traditional author is Dr. Schuckburgh, a surgeon in the French and Indian war, about 1755. The original name of the song, not the air, was "The Yankee's Return from Camp."

Yankees (yäng'këz). [Origin uncertain. According to a common statement, Yankees is a var. of Yenkees or Yengees or Yaunghees, a name said to have been given by the Massachusetts Indians to the English colonists, being, it is supposed, an Indian corruption of the E. word English, or, as some think, of the F. Anglais.] 1. Citizens of New England.—2. By extension, natives of the United States; chiefly a European use.—3. Soldiers of the Federal armies; so called by the Confederates during the Civil War.

Yankton (yäng'kton). A city in Yankton County, South Dakota, situated at the junction of the Dakota and Missouri rivers, in lat. 42° 51' N.; formerly a capital of the Territory of Dakota. Population (1900), 4,125.

Yankton Indians. A tribe of the Sioux.

Yao (yau), or Wayao (wä-you'). A numerous Bantu tribe of Portuguese East Africa, between the upper Rovuma River, the Lujende, and a mountain-range east of Lake Nyassa. They are well built and strong, and have round faces, only slightly prognathic, but with a flat nose. The women wear a small pebble in the pierced lip. Circumcision is practised at the age of puberty, when the boys take a new name. Four dialects of the language, called Klyao, are distinguished, and a Christian literature is coming into existence.

Yap (yüp), or Gnap (gwüp). An island in the Caroline group, North Pacific Ocean. Length, about 10 miles. The German flag was raised over Yap in 1885; and the resulting dispute between Germany and Spain was settled by Pope Leo XIII. In 1885 by the award of the *Caroline*s to Spain. In 1889 the group was purchased by Germany.

Yapoes. See Fuegians.

Yapurá. See Japurá.

Yaqui (yä'kë). See Cahita.

Yaqui (yä'kë). A river in northwestern Mexico which flows into the Gulf of California about lat. 27° 30' N. Length, 200-300 miles.

Yaquina (yä-kin'ä), or Southern Killamuk. The leading tribe of the Yakonin stock of North American Indians. The name means 'tortuons' or 'winding,' which is the characteristic of the stream bearing this name. They formerly lived in 56 villages on both sides of Yaquina River, Oregon, and are now on Siletz reservation, Oregon. They are so mixed with other tribes that their number cannot be ascertained. Also Yukicina, Youickone, Youkone, Iakon, Yakone. See Iakonan.

Yare (yâr). A river in Norfolk, England, which unites with the Waveney to form the Breydon near Yarmouth.

Yariba. See Yoruba.

Yarkand (yâr-kând'). The name given in part of its course to the Tarin.

Yarkand, or Yarkend (yâr-kend'). A city in Eastern Turkestan, Chinese empire, situated on the river Yarkand, about lat. 38° 25' N., in the center of a rich oasis. It has important trade and manufactures of leather, etc. It has been visited in recent times by Shaw, Forsyth, and Carey. Population, estimated, 60,000.

Yarmouth (yâr'muth), or Great Yarmouth. ['Mouth of the Yar or Yare.'] A seaport in England, situated on the North Sea, at the mouths of the Bure and Breydon, in lat. 52° 36' N., long. 1° 43' E. It has important herring, mackerel, cod, and other fisheries, and active trade, and is noted for its cured fish ('Yarmouth bloaters'). The Church of St. Nicholas is the largest parish church in England, measuring 230 by 112 feet. The oldest part of the existing building is the nave (dating from 1190), in a style intermediate between the Norman and the Early English. There is a lofty tower. It is a frequented watering-place. Population (1901), 51,250.

Yarmouth. A seaport, capital of Yarmouth County, at the western extremity of Nova Scotia. Population (1901), 6,430.

Yaroslaw (yâ-rô-slâv'). Died in 1054. Grand prince of Kieff, son of Vladimir. He inherited Novgorod in 1015; soon after made himself master of Kieff; and later became ruler of the greater part of Russia.

Yaroslaw (yâ-rô-slâv'), or Yaroslaw (yâ-rô-slâv'). 1. A government of European Russia, surrounded by the governments of Vologda, Kostroma, Vladimir, Tver, and Novgorod, and traversed by the Volga. It has important manufactures. Area, 13,751 square miles. Population (1891), 1,126,891. — 2. The capital of the government of Yaroslav, situated on the Volga, at its junction with the Kotorost, 165 miles northeast of Moscow. Yoga (yō'gā). [Skt. yōga, from yuj, join.] The fourth of the six systems of Hindu philosophy, or the second of the two divisions of the Sankhya system. Its alleged author is Patanjali, of whom nothing is known. It is set forth in the Yogasutra, a little work in four chapters, translated in part by Ballantyne and entire by Rajendra Lala Mitra. The Yoga is commonly regarded as a theistic development of the Sankhya, directly acknowledging Ishvara, or a supreme being. The aim of it is to teach the means by which the human soul may attain complete union with the Supreme Soul. This fusion may be effected even in the body. According to Patanjali the very word Yoga means 'fixing or concentrating the mind in abstract meditation.' This is secured by preventing the modifications of chitta, or the thinking principle, which arise through the three pranas, perception, inference, and verbal testimony, as well as incorrect ascertainment, fancy, sleep, and recollection. These modifications of chitta are prevented by the constant habit of keeping the mind in an unmodified state, and by complete suppression of the passions. This last, vaivarya, is obtained by contemplation of the Supreme Being, who is a spirit unaffected by works and affections, and is called Om, the repetition of which monosyllable has astonishing results, and the muttering of which, with reflection on its meaning, conduces to a knowledge of the Supreme, and tends to prevent all the obstacles to Yoga. The means of mental concentration are eight: (1) Forbearance or restraint; (2) religious observances; (3) postures; (4) suppression of the breath, or breathing in a peculiar way; (5) restraint of the senses; (6) steadying of the mind; (7) contemplation; (8) profound meditation or religious trance, this last being best attained, according to the Bhagavadgita (VI. 13), by fixing the eyes on the tip of the nose, and similar devices. The system, a contrivance for getting rid of all thought, is a compound of ascetic bodily and mental exercises.

Yogin (yō-gin' or yō'gin), or Yogi (yō-gē' or yō'gō). [Skt., from yoga (which see), yogin being the stem of the substantively used possessive adjective, and yogi its nominative singular masculine.] A follower of the Yoga system; a Hindu devotee or ascetic.

York (yōrk). [L. Eboracum.] A city and county, capital of Yorkshire, situated at the junction of the Foss with the Ouse, in lat. 53° 57' N., long. 1° 5' W.; the seat of an archbishopric. The cathedral (York Minster) is one of the chief English cathedrals, of Norman foundation, but entirely rebuilt in subsequent medieval periods. The transepts are fine, particularly the south transept, built in the first half of the 13th century; it displays three tiers of arcades, increasing in size upward, and the rich gable is almost entirely occupied by a beautiful rose. The square towers of the much-panted west front are of the 15th century, as is the massive central tower; the Perpendicular choir and Lady chapel are of the 14th. The interior is highly impressive from its size and height. The elaborate vaulting is of wood. A massive sculptured roof-screen separates the nave from the choir. The Perpendicular window which fills almost the whole east end measures 75 by 33 feet, being surpassed only by that at Gloucester. The north transept possesses the celebrated group of lancets known as the Five Sisters. The cathedral possesses more old glass (11th and 15th centuries) than any other in England. Among its tombs that of Archbishop Grey (1256) is the most remarkable. The dimensions are 525 by 110 feet; length of transepts, 222; height of vaulting, 100; of western towers, 201 feet. The octagonal Decorated chapter-house, without central pillar, is of exceptional beauty. Micklegate Bar is one of the six medieval city gates. It is a high square battlemented tower, with bartizans on the angles, whose arch spans the roadway. Besides the cathedral there are several interesting churches, St. Mary's Abbey, and a castle. York was the capital of Britain during the Roman occupation; was visited by Hadrian; and was the place of death of Severus and Constantius Chlorus. In York Constantine was proclaimed emperor. Later it was the capital of Northumbria and Deira, and an important Danish city. It was an early seat of learning. It was taken by William the Conqueror in 1068; revolted and was retaken by him in 1069; was the meeting-place of several parliaments; and was besieged and taken by the Parliamentarians in 1644. Population (1901), 77,793.

He founded the "Popular Science Monthly" in 1872; planned the "International Scientific Series"; and published a "Chemical Chart" (1851), "Class-book of Chemistry" (1852), "Atlas of Chemistry" (1854), and "Hand-book of Household Science" (1857). In 1864 he published "The Correlation and Conservation of Forces," a series of articles by prominent scientists on the new theory of forces, with an introduction. He also edited "The Culture Demanded by Modern Life" in 1867, and was instrumental in the publication of Herbert Spencer's works in America, especially in popularizing his theory of evolution. His sister acted as his amanuensis from 1845 on account of the failure of his eyesight.

Youmans, Eliza A. Born at Saratoga, 1826. An American botanist, sister of E. L. Youmans.

Young (yung), Arthur. Born in Suffolk, England, Sept. 11, 1741; died at London, April 20, 1820. An English traveler and noted agricultural and economic writer. He was engaged (unsuccessfully) in farming, and was appointed secretary of the Board of Agriculture in 1793. He is best known from his accounts of travels in England, Wales, and Ireland, and especially in France (1787-90), during which he observed closely and scientifically the condition of agriculture. His works include "A Six Weeks' Tour through the Southern Counties of England and Wales" (1768), "A Six Months' Tour through the North of England" (1771), "A Farmer's Tour through the East of England" (1770-71), "A Course of Experimental Agriculture" (1770), "The Farmer's Calendar" (1771), "Political Arithmetic" (1774), "A Tour in Ireland" (1780), "Travels in France," his chief work (1792-94). He edited "Annals of Agriculture."

Young, Brigham. Born at Whitingham, Vt., June 1, 1801; died at Salt Lake City, Aug. 29, 1877. A Mormon leader, president of the Mormon Church. In early life he was by trade a carpenter, painter, and glazier in Mendon, New York. He was converted to Mormonism in 1831; began to preach in 1832, and in that year joined the Mormons at Kirtland, Ohio; was made an elder in 1832, and an apostle in 1835; and was chosen president of the church as successor to Smith in 1844. He conducted the emigration from Nauvoo to Utah 1846-48; was elected governor of "Deseret" in 1849; and was appointed governor of Utah Territory by President Fillmore. In 1852 he proclaimed the doctrine of polygamy. He defied the United States government, and was removed from the governorship by President Buchanan. In 1871 he was indicted for polygamy, but was not convicted. At his death he had 17 wives. He was head of the secret order of Danites (which see).

Young, Charles Augustus. Born at Hanover, N. H., Dec. 15, 1834. A noted American astronomer. He graduated at Dartmouth in 1853; and became professor at Western Reserve College in 1856, at Dartmouth in 1865, and (of astronomy) at Princeton in 1877. He is especially noted for his researches on the sun. He has written "The Sun" (1882), "A Text-book of General Astronomy" (1888).

Young, Charles Mayne. Born at London, Jan. 10, 1777; died near Brighton, June 28, 1856. An English actor. He made his regular debut at Liverpool in 1798, as Young Norval, with great success. A year later he was leading man at Mocheater, and became afterward an intimate friend of Sir Walter Scott. His repertoire was large, including Don Felix in "The Wonder," Rollo in "Pizarro," Penruddock in "The Wheel of Fortune," Petruccio, Sir Edward Mortimer in "The Iron Chest," etc. His greatest success was in Kemble's celebrated revival of "Julius Cæsar" in 1812. His farewell benefit occurred at Covent Garden, May 31, 1832, when he appeared as Hamlet, and, in his honor, Mathews appeared as Polonius and Macready as the Ghost.

Young, Edward. Born at Upham, near Winchester, England, June, 1681; died April 12, 1765. An English poet. He was educated at Oxford, and in 1730 became rector of Welwyn in Hertfordshire. His chief poetical work is "Night Thoughts" (1742-46). He also wrote satires under the title "Love of Fame, the Universal Passion" (1765-68), the dramas "Bursaris" (1719) and "The Revenge" (1723), etc.

Young, Edward Daniel. Born 1831. An English traveler in Africa. He explored the Lake Nyassa region in 1875, and wrote "Nyassa" (1877).

Young, John, Baron Lisgar. Born in Bombay, Aug. 31, 1807; died in Ireland, Oct. 6, 1876. A British politician. He was secretary of the treasury 1844-46; chief secretary for Ireland 1852-55; later lord high commissioner of the Ionian Islands and governor of New South Wales; and governor-general of Canada 1868-72.

Young, John Russell. Born at Downingtown, Pa., Nov. 20, 1841; died at Washington, D. C., Jan. 17, 1899. An American journalist. He was connected successively with the Philadelphia "Press," New York "Tribune," and "New York Herald"; accompanied Grant in his tour around the world; was United States minister to China 1882-85; and librarian of Congress 1897-99. He published "Around the World with General Grant" (1879).

Young, Robert. Born at Edinburgh, Sept. 10, 1822; died there, Oct. 14, 1889. A Scottish biblical scholar, best known from his "Analytical Concordance to the Bible."

Young, Thomas. Born at Milverton, Somerset, England, June 13, 1773; died at London, May 10, 1829. A celebrated English physicist, mathematician, and general scholar. He studied medicine at London, Edinburgh, Göttingen, and Cambridge, but did not practise his profession. He became professor at the Royal Institution in 1802; was foreign secretary of the Royal Society for many years; and was secretary of the Board of Longitude (which conducted the "Nautical Almanac"). He discovered the law of the interference of light, which contributed largely to the establishment of the undulatory theory of light; suggested the theory of color-sensation afterward developed by Helmholtz; and made some progress in the deciphering of the Egyptian hieroglyphics. Among his works are "Syllabus of a Course of Lectures" (1802), "Course of Lectures on Natural Philosophy and the Mechanical Arts" (1807), articles on Egyptology, etc.

Ysengrimus. See Reynard the Fox.

Ysolde, Ysonde. See Iscult.

Ysopet. See the extract.

... The Ysopet of Marie de France . . . may be said to be a link of juncture between the Fabliau and the Roman du Renart. Ysopet (diminutive of Esop) became a common term in the middle ages for a collection of fables. That of Marie is by far the most important. It consists of 103 pieces, written in octosyllabic couplets, with moralities, and a conclusion which informs us that the author wrote it "for the love of Count William" (supposed to be Longsword), translating it from an English version of a Latin translation of the Greek. Marie's graceful style and her easy versification are very noticeable here, while her morals are often well deduced and sharply put. Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 60.

Yssel (i'sel). The name of several streams in the Netherlands. Among them are: (a) The Nieuwe Yssel, an arm of the Rhine, from which it separates east of Arnhem. It joins the Oude Yssel at Doesburg, and flows as the Yssel into the Zuider Zee 43 miles east by north of Amsterdam. It receives the Berkel and Schipbeek. Length, about 70 miles; navigable. (b) The Neder Yssel (Little or Dutch Yssel), an arm of the Leek, from which it separates at Vianen. It flows into the Meuse above Rotterdam.

Yuma. See Cuchan.

Yumaa (yó'maa). A linguistic stock of North American Indians. It formerly occupied the extreme southwest part of the United States, including much of the valleys of the Colorado and Gila rivers, the whole of Lower California, and a small area in Mexico on the Gulf of California about the 27th degree of north latitude. Its name is from a Cuchan word meaning 'sons of the river.' Its number in the United States in specified localities is nearly 5,000; that in Mexico is not known.

Yuncas. See Chimu.

Yunnan (yun-nän'). A province in the southwestern extremity of China, bounded by China proper, Tibet, Burma, and Tongking. Area, about 150,000 square miles. Population, estimated, 12,000,000.

Yurok (yö'rok). A division of North American Indians, living in California. The name is from a Karok word meaning 'down' or 'below.' In 1870 their number was 2,700, which has since greatly decreased. See Weitspekan.

Yurucares (yö-rö-kü-räs'). [Probably corrupted from the Quichua yurak, white, and kari, men.] Indians of Bolivia, northeast of La Paz, at the foot of the mountains and in the forest-covered plains between the rivers Manoré and Beni. They are tall and well formed, and nearly as white as Europeans (perhaps from the effects of a skin-disease). Their dress is a robe of bark cloth stamped with figures from engraved blocks. They are excessively vain, and are given to prolonged drinking-bouts (of chicha, prepared from maize). On his marriage, each man prepares a house and plantation widely separated from all others. They plant maize and manioc, but subsist largely by hunting. Children are often killed to get rid of them; but, by a strange custom, they are never punished, and are allowed complete liberty. The men often engage in duels with bows and arrows. They have a very complicated mythology. Several herds are distinguished by different names, but all together do not now number more than 2,000.

Zachariah (zak-a-rä'ä). [Heb., 'remembered by Jehovah'; Gr. Zacharias.] King of Israel, son of Jeroboam II. See the extract and Jeroboam. See Zachariah.

According to the chronology which has passed into general currency from the "Annals" of Archbishop Ussher, and is represented on the margins of most English Bibles, the death of Jeroboam was followed by an interregnum of eleven years, after which his son Zachariah reigned for six months, when he was slain by Shallum. The Bible knows nothing of this interregnum, but on the contrary informs us in the usual way that Zachariah reigned in his father's stead (2 Kings xiv. 29). The coronation of Zachariah must in fact have followed as a matter of course, since his father died in peaceable possession of the throne.

W. R. Smith. Prophets of Israel, p. 145.

Zacharias (zak-a-rä'äs). The Greek form of Zachariah, mentioned as the name of several different persons in the Bible.

Zapotec-Mixtec stock (tzä-pō'tek'mēs'tek'stok). A linguistic stock of Mexican Indians, principally in Oajaca, extending into Guerrero and Puebla. It includes the Zapotecs, Mixtecs, and several smaller branches (Chatinos, Mazatecos, Soltecos, etc.). All are Catholics and submissive to Mexican rule. Estimated number, nearly 700,000.

Zapotecs (tzä-pō'teks'). Indians of southern Mexico, occupying the greater part of the state of Oajaca, and extending into Guerrero. Before the Spanish conquest they formed a powerful nation, and in culture and warlike prowess were not inferior to the Aztecs, whom they successfully resisted in several invasions. Their political system seems to have been a tribal federation. They constructed buildings of stone and mortar; subsisted mainly by agriculture; had a complicated mythology; and offered human sacrifices to their idols. Their system of numeration, calendar, and many of their rites and customs resembled those of the Nahuatl tribes; but their language was entirely distinct. In war they used cotton armor. Mitla and other similar ruins in their territory were regarded by them as the tombs of their ancestors. The Zapotecs were conquered by the Spaniards in 1522-26. After transient revolts in 1581 and 1580, they submitted to missionary influence, and they are now a peaceful and laborious part of the Mexican population. They are intelligent, and frequently attain positions of trust; the celebrated president Juárez was a pure-blooded Zapotec. Estimated number, 260,000, of whom about 50,000 speak only their own language. Also written Zapotecos or Tzapotecos.

Their color is varied, owing to the great admixture of slaves from other districts; but the black complexion is preferred. They wear European cloth, dyed in native fashion, and a peculiar necklace of beadwork. In every village there are a few large houses, consisting of a stout framework, thatched roof, and walls made of large plates of bark. Formerly troublesome, they have become peaceful. The country is called Zaramo, the language Kizaramo. Most of the people speak also Swahili.

Zárate (thür'ä-tä). Agustin de. Born about 1492; died at Madrid (?) about 1560. A Spanish historian. He was comptroller of Castile, and in 1543 went to Peru with the viceroy Nuñez Vela to examine into the financial affairs of the country. After his return he was treasurer of the Spanish Netherlands. He wrote "Historia del descubrimiento y conquista de la provincia del Perú" (1556; later editions and translations).

Zarathushtra (za-ra-thösh'tra). [In mod. Pers. Zardusht, Gr. Zoroástris, L. Zoroaster.] The founder of the Perso-Iranian national religion, which prevailed from the time of the Achaemenidae (559-330 B. C.) to the close of the Sassanian dynasty (226-641 A. D.). It is to-day represented in Persia and Russian Transcaucasia by a population of about 8,000 in Yazd and neighboring villages, Teheran, Isfahan, Shiraz, and Baku, and by more than 50,000 in Bombay and the vicinity (the Parsis). The many attempts to etymologize the name cannot be considered as more than guesses. The extensive literature regarding Zarathushtra consists on the one hand of notices in Greek and Latin writers, on the other of what can be got from the Avesta and from the later Persian and Parsi literature. The one inference of value from the former source is that Zarathushtra was a historical person. The first inference from the Gathas of the Avesta (see these names) is that they relate to a time and place of transition from a nomadic to an agricultural life. This place must have been in or near the region from which the Vedic Hindus went southward into the valley of the Indus, and the Iranians westward: for the language of the Gathas, and even the primitive types of meter employed in the Avesta, stand very near to the Vedic, and in the absence of special proof to the contrary closely resembling dialects prove a close geographical vicinity. Such proof is not found in the legends that place the birth of Zarathushtra in Rhage or Shiz, both in Media. Mazdayasnianism, reaching its complete development in West Iran, could not in the view of its West Iranian supporters have originated except there in the chief seat of its culture. Supposing the religion to have originated in Bactria and reached its culmination in Media the distance and the development of doctrine and practice in the Avesta, regarded as a whole, would imply a considerable age for the first beginnings. Roth puts them at about 1200 B. C. Primitive Zarathushtrianism had a brief creed, very different from the complicated prescriptions of the Vendidad and the extravagances of the Yashts. Varuna the highest of the Adityas, the sons of Aditi the infinite, as the chief god of light, and especially of the illuminated night heaven, was common to both branches of the Aryan race before its separation into Indian and Iranian. With Varuna were associated the highest spiritual conceptions. These the Hindus soon lost in an ever-increasing tendency to personify and worship the various powers of nature, while the Iranians had a longer and firmer grasp of them. The development of the spiritual side of Varuna into the conception of Ahuramazda the Spiritual Wise One, or the Wise Spirit, or at least the clear expression of this view, was the essential fact in the work of Zarathushtra. As Varuna becomes Ahuramazda, the other Adityas become the Amesha Spentas or Amshaspands, the Immortal Holy Ones, the expression of his qualities and his ministering spirits. From the dominance of the supreme god of light grew a recognition of an opposing principle of darkness; and as light symbolizes truth, this principle found a natural designation in Druj or deceit, the same as Angro Manyush or Ahirman. The dethroned devas (gods) of the popular religion, who were no longer to be worshipped in conjunction with the supreme Ahuramazda, were regarded as the servants of Druj, and were degraded to the rank of demons or devils. Good thoughts, good words, and good actions are the object of moral striving. Holiness is rewarded by immortality and heaven. The tillage of the soil is the best of actions. The elements—earth, air, fire and water, but especially fire—receive homage as creations of Ahuramazda. Zarathushtra lived under a king, Vishtaspa, who in the epic is king of Bactria. There is absolutely no reason for identifying him with Hystaspes, father of Darius. Zarathushtra had several sons and daughters. According to the Shahnama, he was murdered at the altar by Turanians who stormed Balkh. All attempts to connect him with Hebrew legends are groundless.

Zarephath. See Sarepta.

Zenobia (ze-nō'bi-ä). Died after 274. Queen of Palmyra, wife of Odenathus, ruler of Palmyra. She was joint ruler in her husband's lifetime, and succeeded him in 271 as regent for her son and as queen. Her armies were defeated by Aurelian in 271; Palmyra was besieged and taken in 272; and she was captured and brought to Rome.

Zenobia. In Hawthorne's "Blithedale Romance," an impulsive, passionate woman who drowns herself.

At length the body is found, and poor Zenobia is brought to the shore with her knees still bent in the attitude of prayer, and her hands clenched in immitigable defiance. Foster tries in vain to straighten the dead limbs. As the fester of the story gazes at her, the grimly ludicrous recollection occurs to him that if Zenobia had foreseen all "the ugly circumstances of death—how ill it would become her, the altogether unseemly aspect which she must put on, and especially old Silas Foster's efforts to improve the matter—she would no more have committed the dreadful act than have exhibited herself to a public assembly in a badly fitting garment."

Leslie Stephen, Hours in a Library, p. 236.

Zenobia, or the Fall of Palmyra. A historical novel by William Ware, founded on the life of Queen Zenobia, published in 1837 as "Letters from Palmyra" and shortly after under its present title.

Zeus (zūs). [Gr. Ζεύς, L. Jovis (gen.), Jupiter.] In Greek mythology, the chief and master of the gods, the supreme deity, omnipresent and all-powerful, generally looked upon as the son of Cronus and Rhea, and held to have dethroned and succeeded his father. In a narrower sense, he was the god of the heavens, and controlled all celestial phenomena, as rains, snows, and tempests, heat and cold, and the lightning. His consort was Hera. Zeus was worshiped universally; but the most renowned of his sanctuaries were those of Olympia in Elis and Dodona in Epirus. In art Zeus was represented as a majestic and powerful figure, with full beard and flowing hair, in early works sometimes fully draped, but in later art, in general, only lightly draped in the himation. The type fixed by Phidias in the second half of the 5th century B. C., in his great chryselephantine statue for the temple at Olympia, influenced all artists who came after him. The usual attributes of the god are a long staff or scepter, the thunderbolt, the eagle, and sometimes a figure of Victory borne on one hand. The head is generally encircled by a fillet or a wreath; in later sculptures the hair rises from the brow in luxuriant locks like a crown, and falls in masses on either side of the face. Compare Jupiter.

Zeus, Olympian. A colossal chryselephantine statue of Zeus by Phidias, placed in the temple at Olympia, Greece. (See Olympia and Olympicum.) It was removed to Constantinople in the 5th century A. D., and burned in 476.

Zillerthaler Alps. A group of Alps in Tyrol, extending from the Brenner eastward to the Hohe Tauern.

Zimbabwe (zēm-bäb'wä). A ruined city in Mashonaland, southeastern Africa, discovered by Mauch in 1871. See the extract.

The ruins of the Great Zimbabwe are in south latitude 20° 16' 30" and east longitude 31° 10' 10", at an elevation of 3,300 feet above the sea-level. They form the principal of a long series of such ruins stretching up the whole length of the west side of the Sabi river, the southernmost, which we visited, being that on the Lundi, and the northernmost in the Mazoe valley. There are also many other ruins on the Limpopo, in the Transvaal, in Matabeleland, at Tati, the Impakwe, and elsewhere, all of the same type and construction; but time would not permit our visiting them. Some are equal to the ruins of the Great Zimbabwe in workmanship, others again are very inferior, and point to the occupation of this country having continued over a long period, probably centuries. These all would seem to have been abandoned at one time in the face of some overwhelming calamity, for all the gateways at the Great Zimbabwe and at Matindela, the second ruin in importance, 80 miles northeast of it as the crow flies, have been carefully walled up as for a siege.

Theodore Bent, quoted in Appleton's Annual Cyclopaedia, 1892, p. 302.

He wrote sermons, hymns, polemics, etc.

Zion (zi'on), or Sion (si'on), Mount. A hill on which was situated the old city of Jerusalem: the "city of David." The name was probably given originally to the Lower City or Aca, and then transferred to Mount Moriah, the Temple Hill. It has also been applied to the Upper City, and to Jerusalem as a whole, and symbolically to the Christian church and heaven.

Zipango, or Zipangu. See Cipango.

Zipas (zë'päs). [Zipa, powerful chief.] The chiefs or kings of the ancient Chibcha Indians of Colombia. At the time of the conquest they ruled the plateau of Bogotá and all the territory corresponding to the western part of the modern department of Cundinamarca; this is often called the Kingdom of the Zipas. Another branch of the Chibchas, about Tunja (Boyacá), was ruled by chiefs called Zaques. At the time of the conquest the Zaques were at war with the Zipas, who, however, were much more powerful. The Zipas were absolute monarchs, and were treated with great ceremony. Each Zipa was the son of the sister of his predecessor, and was kept under special guardianship from his childhood, subject to singular rules; for example, he was not permitted to see the sun, and he could not eat salt. Subsequently he took the dignity of chief vassal until he attained the throne. He was allowed but one wife, but had hundreds of concubines. He left his house only in solemn procession, and his subjects were forbidden to look at him. At his death the whole kingdom went into mourning. Also written Cipasa.

Zipporah (zip'ô-ri). [Heb., 'little bird.'] Wife of Moses; daughter of the Midianite priest Jethro.

Zoan (zö'an). See the extract.

Sân, or Tanis, the Tân, or Zeon of the Bible, is situated about twenty miles north of Tell-el-Kehir. It is of extremely ancient date, the cartouche of Peps I., a king of the sixth Dynasty, having been discovered there. It is mentioned in the Old Testament as having been founded seven years later than Hebron. It was used by the Hyksos as their capital, and was probably the residence of Joseph. In the reign of Ramses II. it was celebrated for its beauty, for the fertility of its fields, and for the abundance of both wild birds and fish. "He rejoices who has settled there." Later on the priests of Zoan-Tanis sided with Hir Hor, the priestly usurper of the throne of Ramses. Under the Twenty-third Dynasty it was again the seat of government. In the stele of Piankhi on Gebel Barkal we find an unnamed satrap ruling in Tanis. Finally Assurbanipal subdued the city and took the governor prisoner.

Mariette, Outlines, p. 26, note.

Zohar (zö'här), or Sohar (sö'här), or Sepher-haz-Zohar. ['Book of Splendor or of Light.'] A esoteric work, in the form of a commentary on the Pentateuch. It is ascribed traditionally to the 2d century A. D., but by many is thought to have been written much later (13th century, by Moses de Leon).

Zoilus (zö'i-lus). [Gr. Zoilos.] Lived in the 4th century B. C. A Greek rhetorician; called "Homeromastix" ("Scourge of Homer") from his severe criticisms of Homer.

Zola (zö'lä; F. pron. zö-lä'), Émile. Born at Paris, April 2, 1840; died there, Sept. 29, 1902. A noted French novelist. His father was Italian and his mother French. He studied at the Lycée Saint-Louis, but did not take a degree. From 1860 to 1862 he lived in great poverty, and finally entered Hachette's bookstore as a packing clerk. He studied the details of publishing until the close of the year 1865, but devoted to writing all the time that was his own. In 1864 he published his first work, "Contes à Ninon," followed in 1874 by the "Nouveaux contes à Ninon." In 1865 appeared "La confession de Claude," and then other separate novels as "Le von d'une morte" (1869), "Les mystères de Marseille" (1867), "Thérèse Raquin" (1867), and "Madelaine Féral" (1868); also a number of short stories (1882-84). From 1871 to 1893 Zola published, under the collective title "Les Rougon-Macquart," twenty novels: "La fortune des Rougons" (1871), "La curée" (1872), "Le ventre de Paris" (1873), "La conquête de Plassans" (1874), "La faute de Fabrice Mouret" (1875), "Son excellence Eugène Rougon" (1876), "L'Assommoir" (1877), "Une page d'amour" (1878), "Nana" (1880), "Pot-Bouille" (1882), "Au bonheur des dames" (1883), "La joie de vivre" (1884), "Germinal" (1885), "Le roman expérimental" (1887), "Le rêve" (1888), "La bête humaine" (1890), "Le roman expérimental" (1891), "Le docteur Pascal" (1893). His "Trilogy of the Three Cities" includes "Lourdes" (1891), "Rome" (1896), and "Paris" (1898). His writings in French include "Mes haines" (1896), "Mon salon" (1896), "Edouard Manet" (1897), "La République Française et la littérature" (1879), "Le roman expérimental" (1880), "Le naturalisme au théâtre" (1881), "Nos auteurs dramatiques" (1881), "Les romanciers naturalistes" (1881), "Une campagne" (1881), and "Documents littéraires, études et portraits" (1881). Some of his novels have been dramatized, as "L'Assommoir" (1879), "Le ventre de Paris" (1887), "Renée" (1887; adapted from "La curée"), and "Germinal" (1888). Zola is the leader of the school of naturalism in France. On Feb. 23, 1898, he was sentenced to a year's imprisonment and the payment of a fine of 3,000 francs for libeling the court martial which tried and acquitted Major Esterhazy. The sentence was annulled by the Court of Cassation. He was again tried and sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment and the payment of a fine. He left France before notification of judgment in order to secure a retrial later, but soon returned.

Zöllner (tsël'ner), Hugo. Born at Oberhausen, Prussia, Jan. 12, 1852. A German traveler and journalist. He was traveling correspondent of the "Kölnische Zeitung," and explored and annexed for Germany various regions in West Africa in 1884-85. He wrote accounts of travels round the world and in Africa.

Zöllner. Same as Holenzöllner.

Zollicoffer (zöl'i-kof-er), Felix Kirk. Born in Tennessee, May 19, 1812; killed at the battle of Mill Springs, Ky., Jan. 19, 1862. An American journalist, politician, and soldier. He was Whig member of Congress from Tennessee 1853-59; a delegate to the peace convention in 1861; and a Confederate brigadier-general. He was one of the Confederate commanders at Mill Spring.

Zöllner (tsël'ner), Johann Karl Friedrich. Born at Berlin, Nov. 8, 1834; died April 25, 1882. A German physicist and astronomer, professor of astronomy at Leipzig from 1866. He is especially noted for his contributions to astronomical (especially solar) physics. He sought to explain spiritualistic phenomena by means of the conception of a fourth dimension of space, and became involved in controversies on this and other matters. His chief works are "Photometrie des Himmels" (1861), "Photometrische Untersuchungen" (1865), "Über die Natur der Kometen" (1872); the last contains much philosophical speculation.

Zollverein (tsöl'fer-in'). [G., from zoll, custom, and verein, union.] A union of German states for the maintenance of a common tariff or uniform rates of duty on imports from other countries, and of free trade among themselves. It began with an agreement in 1828 between Prussia and the grand duchy of Hesse; received a great development in 1834 and succeeding years, ultimately including all the German powers except Austria and a few small states; and is now coextensive with the German Empire.

Zona Libre (thö'nü lé'brä). ['Free zone.'] A narrow strip of territory along the northern border of Mexico, adjoining the United States; by law it extends to a distance of 20 kilometers inland, but in actual usage this varies. The zone was first established in Tamaulipas alone (1858), and it was so called because certain articles imported for consumption in this territory were exempted from customs duties. At present imports to the zone pay 10 per cent. of the ordinary duties, the only exceptions being cattle, which pay the full duty. It has been urged that the Zona Libre is much used for smuggling; but the Mexican authorities claim that it is a commercial necessity owing to the retail trade across the border.

Zone, Free. See Zona Libre.

Zongora (zong-gö'ri), or Wazongora (wä-zong-gö'ri). The principal tribe of the kingdom of Karagwe, in German East Africa, on the southwest shore of Lake Victoria. The language is called Kizongora, and Kinyambo is said to be but a dialect of it.

Zosimus (zö'si-mus). [Gr. Zōsimos.] Lived probably in the first half of the 5th century A. D. A Greek historian, author of a history of the Roman Empire from Augustus to 410.

Zosimus. Bishop of Rome 417-418.

Zosma zōs'mā). [Gr. ζῶμα, a girdle; but the appropriateness of the name is not obvious.] The third-magnitude star δ Leonis, at the root of the animal's tail. The star is also called Duhr, and sometimes Zubra.

Zouave (zō-āv'). See Kabail, Berbers.

Zouaves (zō-āvz'). [F., from the name of a tribe inhabiting Africa.] 1. The soldiers belonging to a corps of light infantry in the French army, distinguished for their dash, intrepidity, and hardihood, and for their peculiar drill and showy Oriental uniform. The Zouaves were organized in Algeria in 1834, and consisted at first of two battalions chiefly of Kabyles and other natives, but ultimately became almost entirely French, with increased numbers. They served exclusively in Algeria till 1854, and afterward fought in European wars.

2. The members of those volunteer regiments of the Union army in the American Civil War (1861-65) which adopted the name and to some extent imitated the dress of the French Zouaves.

Zouaves, Papal or Pontifical. A corps of French soldiers organized at Rome, in 1860, for the defense of the temporal sovereignty of the Pope, under General Lamoricière, one of the first commanders of the Algerian Zouaves. After unsuccessfully resisting the entrance of the Italian government into Rome in 1870, they served in France against the Germans and the Commune, and in 1871 were disbanded.

Zrinyi (zrēn'yē), or Zrini, or Zriny (zrē'nē), Count Niklas. Killed at the siege of Sziget, Sept. 7, 1566. A Hungarian commander, famous for his defense of Sziget, with a garrison of 3,000, against Sultan Solymán's army, Aug.-Sept., 1566.

The Turks were pressing forward along a narrow bridge which led to the castle, when the gates were flung open, a mortar filled with broken iron was fired into their midst, and through the smoke and carnage Zrinyi led his men to their death. Like the famous Light Brigade, the number of these devoted horsemen was six hundred; their leader tied the keys of the castle to his belt, and the banner of the Empire was borne above his head. Zrinyi fell pierced by two musket-shots and an arrow, and the Turks entered the castle of Szigetvár, only to find that a slow match had been applied to a mine containing 3,000 pounds of gunpowder, which speedily sent as many Turks to paradise. The castle still remains a ruin: a monument of the death of a Leonidas and an Alexander.

Poole, Story of Turkey, p. 192.

Zschokke (tshok'ke). Johann Heinrich Daniel. Born at Magdeburg, March 22, 1771; died near Aarau, June 27, 1848. A German-Swiss historian, novelist, and religious writer. Zülpich (tsül'piëh). A small town in the Rhine Province, Prussia, 22 miles southwest of Cologne; the ancient Roman city Tolbiacum. It is incorrectly said to have been the scene of the victory of Clovis over the Alamanni in 496 A. D.

Zulu (zō'l'ö), or Amazulu (ä-mä-zō'l'ö). A Bantu nation of British South Africa. They occupy the region between Natal (from which it is separated by the Tugela and Umzimyati rivers) and Lourenço Marques. The Amazulu proper border on Natal, the Amahute and Amaswazi (or Amazwazi) on Lourenço Marques. The Zulus are fine specimens of physical manhood. They go almost naked, and are great orators and warriors, using the lance and the shield. Their huts are of the beehive pattern, but large. Their language and folk-lore have been more fully illustrated than those of most other Bantu nations. Their military superiority over neighboring tribes is due to the strict military system introduced by Chaka, who, it is said, got his ideas from the European troops in Cape Colony; and the phenomenal success and enlargement of Zulu conquest may be attributed to the custom of incorporating the conquered into their own army. The kingdom of Lobengula (Matabeleland) and that of Umzila (Gazaland) are of Zulu origin; and so are the Landios of the Zambesi. See Cetticayo, Kaffir, Lobengula.
